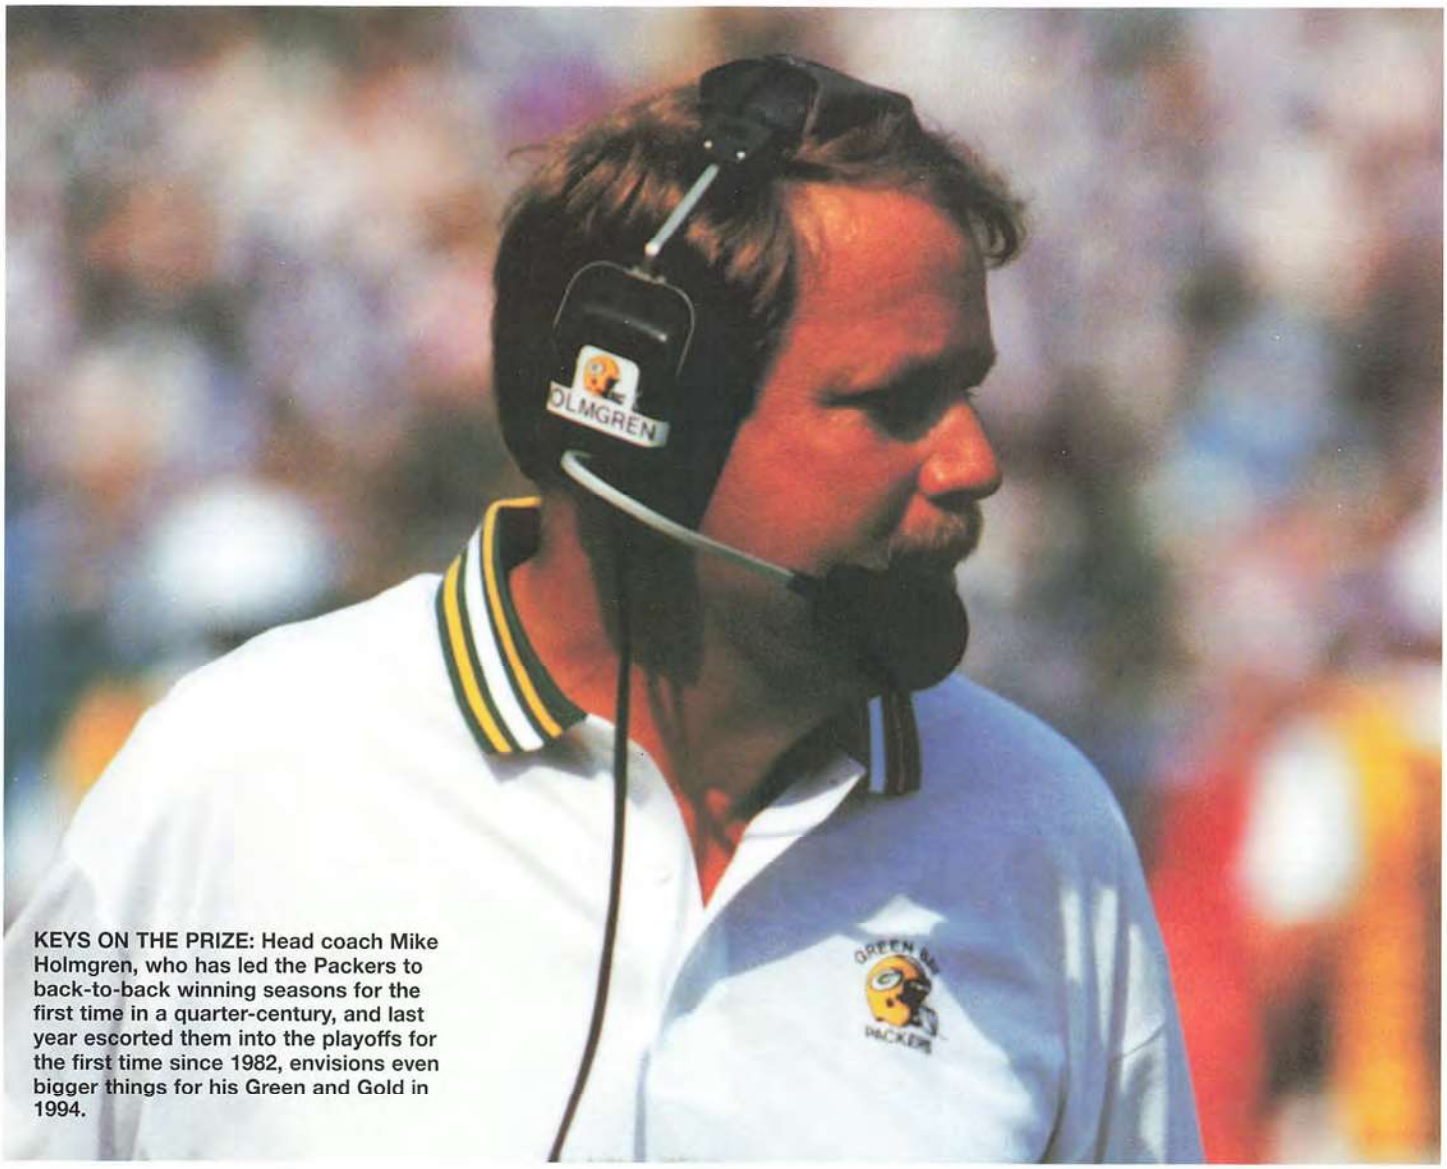
HOLMGREN'S FORECAST:

PLAYOFF PACKERS 'WILL BE BETTER'



KEYS ON THE PRIZE: Head coach Mike Holmgren, who has led the Packers to back-to-back winning seasons for the first time in a quarter-century, and last year escorted them into the playoffs for the first time since 1982, envisions even bigger things for his Green and Gold in 1994.

by Lee Remmel
Editorial Director

What, their expectant loyalists are eager to know, will the Green Bay Packers do for an encore in '94?

This, let it be promptly recorded, is not to suggest they have no new worlds to conquer in the challenging, fast-changing realm of professional football.

But based on the Green and Gold's recent accomplishments, there at long last is real cause for substantial post-season optimism...Even modest hope of getting to the "Big Dance," more formally identified as the Super Bowl—clearly the most desirable "encore."

For prime example, the Packers last year found themselves playing—and winning—in the post-season for the first time in more than a decade.

And, for the first time in a quarter-century, also possessed of back-to-back winning seasons, identical 9-and-7 records in 1992 and 1993, a prosperous parlay last previously recorded under the fabled Vince Lombardi in 1966-67.

Salutary improvement, to be sure.

What then, in terms of artistic progress, can be next?

Head Coach Mike Holmgren, largely responsible for this heartening turnabout from a 4-and-12 disaster in 1991, candidly addressed the question in detail as the '94 season neared.

"There reaches a point, sooner or later, when you say, 'Okay, we're no longer developing—we are there,'" he said by way of prefacing an assessment of his team's 1994 potential. "And now, you've got to do it...I mean you have to reach that point.

"We still have a couple pieces of the puzzle that I would like fixed. And there are still some question marks. But we are approaching that position. And we are getting there maybe a little quicker than I thought possible.

"But I think this: I think our goal is to be a more consistent football team. We matured."

"Now we are in our third year and I would like to say that we're not developing any more, we are there. But, in all honesty, I can't say that, specifically.

"But I think this: I think our goal is to be a more consistent football team. We matured. We have some key players now that have played one and two years in a particular system and they will be better players this year...We will be a better football team this year."

Interjecting a note of caution, Holmgren also felt constrained to observe, "As you get better, your schedule changes just a little bit, and it becomes more difficult. But they're all difficult. You have to be ready to play—and you have to be ready to play well. Otherwise you're going to get beat.

"But this year, I think we are approaching what I wanted for this football team, and that is to be a consistent playoff-caliber football team. Get into the playoffs, get into the tournament, and then play your best football there. Get a few bounces, get a little lucky with injury... And then you can get to the big one."

What, given these factors, might be realistic for the '94 Packers?

"Now we're 9-and-7, 9-and-7," Holmgren said, preparing to venture a qualified forecast. "I've always stayed away from making predictions, and I will not do that this time.

"But we should be better than 9-and-7. We should be," he reemphasized. "And we should go to the playoffs. And we are approaching being that kind of consistent team, in my opinion."

The Packers' tall, imposing field leader then proceeded to delineate "why we've improved ourselves.

"This off-season, what we got, first of all, was Reggie Cobb, the running back we got from Tampa Bay. Of course, we lost Darrell Thompson, who was a wonderful young man who did a great job for us. But Reggie, we feel, gives us the type of back that can play every down. I don't know if we'll use him on third down all the time, but he can play every down and is an exceptional, instinctive runner. Really, a very, very gifted young man. And so we are very pleased with Reggie Cobb. And that, we feel, was a great acquisition.

"The other big one in free agency we went after, obviously, was Sean Jones. And we lost Tony Bennett. So there's a little bit of a push there. But, in Sean Jones, you get a Pro Bowl player—a very smart veteran, a very, very bright guy who has rushed the passer and done it consistently throughout his whole career.

"And we'll play Reggie (White) somewhere on one side, Sean somewhere on the other side and put (John) Jurkovic somewhere in the middle."

The latter scenario—subsequently enhanced with the late addition of former Chicago Bear standout Steve McMichael—prompted Holmgren to observe with obvious anticipation, "I think we have a really good nucleus there for pass rush. Not only that, but for maturity in the locker room...And Sean will bring a lot to this football team."

Holmgren expressed similarly positive sentiments about the acquisition of McMichael, the tenth-ranking career sack artist in NFL annals.

"Signing Steve was a good thing for us," he declared. "He's going to help us. He'll bring a lot to this team. And he'll bring a little uniqueness (McMichael's off-field interests include hunting rattlesnakes and ownership of the oldest tavern in the great state of Texas) that we don't have right now."

Turning to the other side of the football, the Packer coach posed a rhetorical question...one he promptly proceeded to answer.

"Who," he asked, "has to do it on offense?"

Then, in immediate response, the former USC field general ticked off what needs to happen:

"—Robert Brooks has to have a great year.

"—Brett Favre has to have a great year.

"Those are the two key people, in my opinion—Reggie Cobb I already mentioned, on offense—that have to play, that have to really show.

"And Brett—there is no reason to think he won't (play well). He led the NFL in passes thrown and passes completed last season—and in almost every category.

"Unfortunately, he also led in interceptions, and that's one area—if we can cut that in half, and we can do that—if we cut that in half, we win three or four more games. Just with that one stat—if everyone else just plays the way they played last year.

"And I expect them to play better."

Elaborating on the appraisal of his young quarterback, who has been a source of both pride and pain to him over the course of the past two seasons, Holmgren volunteered, "I hope we have a pretty long run together and, if I ever write a book, he will be a couple of chapters in there, because this guy's really something special.

"The reason I love him so much is that, he does some crazy young things every once in a while. But, in the fourth quarter, when the young man comes over to the sideline in a pressure situation like that—he has a certain calmness about him, he really does. And that's something you can't teach all the time—particularly at the quarterback position.

"And so, if we can just correct some of the other little things that happen on occasion, we're going to be just fine."

Holmgren then returned to an assessment of the keys to an upgrade of the unit which made a genuine quantum leap in 1993 (from 23rd place in 1992 to second last season), the defense.

"Defensively...Sean Jones—he has to have a big year," he said, an observation which led him to a more sobering concern in his analysis.

"Our young linebackers—you know, we got just killed at linebacker last season," he said. "Brian Noble, of course, was injured and had to retire. George Koonce was hurt. James Willis was hurt. And Johnny Holland, our leading tackler the last two years and a team leader, had to retire. Mark D'Onofrio has had to retire because of injury. All at the same position...An unbelievable string of events that has affected our football team. So we've got to keep our fingers crossed on the linebackers we drafted and then the guys that have been hurt, coming off those injuries.

"George Teague developed a thyroid problem and he's on medication. He's a skinny guy anyway, and he lost so much weight. But he's responded—they've treated it—they understand what the problem is. It's just taking a while....But he's so critical to what we have to get done on defense, particularly with a new defensive coordinator...But that will be one of the keys to our defense this season."

"But I know this—that he's faster than anybody we have on the field."

Although understandably disappointed over losing first round draft choice Aaron Taylor of Notre Dame for most of the season following knee surgery, Holmgren is clearly excited about the dimension that rookie running back LeShon Johnson of Northern Illinois brings to the Packer offense.

"He led the nation in rushing and he is as quick and fast a player as I've had since we've been here," he said. "Now exactly where he's going to fit in in the total scheme, I don't know yet. But I know this—that he's faster than anybody we have on the field. And he will be exciting—and we're going to give him his chance in the preseason and see what he can do.

"And he is on a mission. This young guy is very disappointed he lasted until the third round. You like guys like that. And," Holmgren slyly appended, "I remind him of that on occasion.

"I think our fans are going to be very excited about him...I think it might have been the steal of the draft, quite frankly."

Holmgren also is enthused over the three new members of his coaching staff—Fritz Shurmur, Larry Brooks and Harry Sydney—and the assets they bring to the Packer table.

"They are quality, quality men," he asserted. "Fritz comes with a wealth of experience. All those years he was defensive coordinator for the Los Angeles Rams, we just butted heads (Holmgren was a member of the San Francisco 49ers' staff during that period) and he gave us as many problems as any defensive coordinator I ever played against. Plus he's a very flexible guy—he's coached for a lot of years and he is really good.

"Larry Brooks was an all-pro defensive lineman for the Los Angeles Rams and then coached there for six or seven years with Fritz, and he has a different style from (predecessor) Greg Blache, who left to go to Indianapolis, but he has really been there. Instant credibility—the players know this guy has gone to the Pro Bowl. He's done it, and they listen to him.

The head coach is pensive as he watches his team get ready for battle during pregame warmups.

"And Harry (Sydney) is going to do a number of things—strength and conditioning, and he helps Nolan (Cromwell) on special teams...So the coaching changes that happened in the off-season will turn out to be very positive for the Green Bay Packers."

Holmgren, summing up, was able to put the task at hand in perspective by reviewing his first two seasons as custodian of Green Bay's NFL on-field fortunes.

"My first year, okay, I kind of said we surprised some people," he observed. "We were 9-and-7 and we had this young quarterback we kind of threw out onto the field. And you never knew what was going to happen, really. But we had a nice little run—won six in a row my first year.

"There was a lot of optimism going into last season. We signed Reggie White, of course, and everyone was very, very excited—and should have been. I tried to temper that enthusiasm a little bit, saying signing Reggie White did not guarantee going to the Super Bowl. There are no guarantees like that. It made us a better football team—no question about that. We went from 23 on defense to 2—with no noticeable dramatic personnel changes except for one man.

"But we did not win the Super Bowl—although we took the next step...We did not beat Detroit in the last game of the regular season to win the division which, obviously, we all wanted desperately. But we were able to come back the next week in Detroit and win that playoff game.

"I remember flying into Green Bay that night—into that little airport—and as we were coming into the airport, it was wonderful. The cars—the red lights from all the cars—they were lined up as far as you could see down the road.

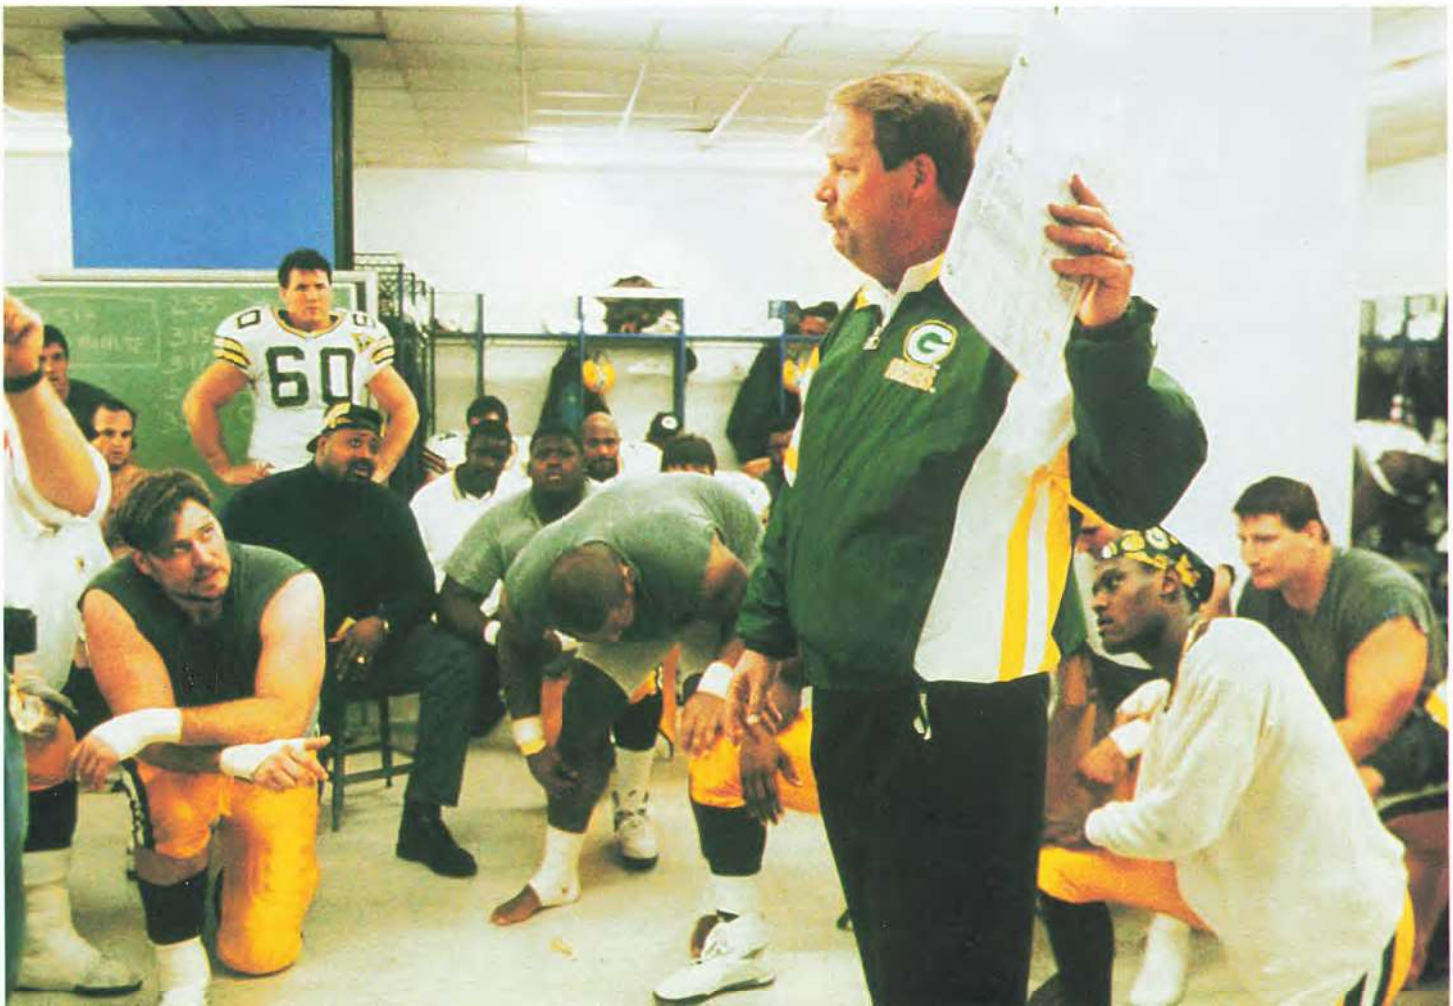
"And, after the Super Bowls I was a part of in San Francisco, we had the ticker tape parade down Market Street—right downtown—vintage cars were sitting in there and 250,000 people...That was great. But this thing last year was unbelievable...a tremendous emotion."

Could there be another, even bigger celebration next January?

Holmgren, as he suggested, is not one to make predictions.

But he did deliver one general, highly positive observation, certain to gladden the hearts of the ever-fervent faithful.

"I feel good about this season," he said. "I like our chances...I really do."



Elated Mike Holmgren, with his "ready list" still in hand, congratulates the Packers in the dressing room following their 28-24 playoff victory in the Pontiac, MI., Silverdome January 8.

SHARPE

HE'LL BE ALONE AT THE TOP

by Tom Oates
Wisconsin State Journal

He has already streaked past the legendary Don Hutson. The next time you see him, he'll be running a deep pattern past the graceful James Lofton—directly into the Green Bay Packers record book.

Silent but deadly Sterling Sharpe, a running back in wide receiver's clothing, is about to become the most prolific pass receiver in Packers' history.

If Sharpe played for an expansion team like the Tampa Bay Buccaneers or a ground-oriented team like the Chicago Bears, that statistic might not be particularly meaningful. Because he plays for the Packers, however, Sharpe is routinely measured against some of the NFL's all-time great receivers. He has rendered the comparisons meaningless.

In 11 seasons with the Packers in the 1930s and '40s, Hutson posted Wayne Gretzky-like numbers, totals that were so far beyond his contemporaries they revolutionized the game. Lofton, who played nine seasons in Green Bay and completed his 16th season last fall with the Philadelphia Eagles, has gained more yards catching passes than any player in NFL history.

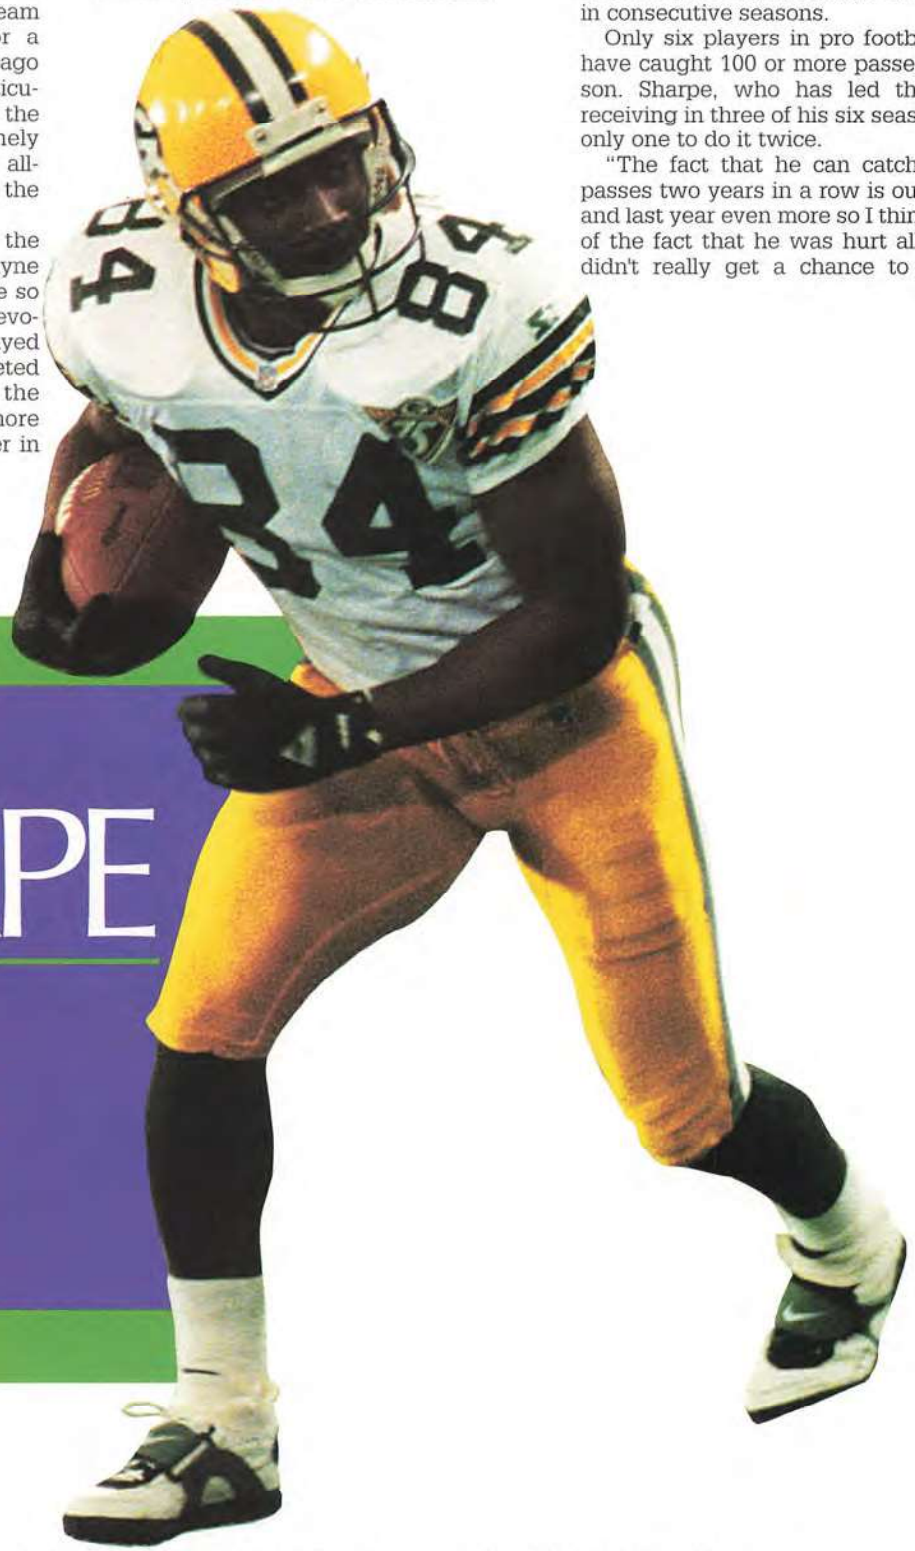
But Sharpe is moving past them faster than he sheds a 170-pound cornerback playing bump-and-run coverage. He soared beyond Hutson's 488 catches last season, when he pushed his total to 501 in only six seasons. Next up is Lofton's team record of 530 receptions, which should fall the first week in October if Sharpe maintains his pace of the last two seasons.

"Those are startling numbers," said Jon Gruden, the Packers' receivers coach. "It's a tribute to his ability and his durability."

A more startling realization is that Sharpe keeps picking up the pace. His 112 catches last season broke the NFL record of 108 he had set the season before. His 220 catches over the last two seasons are 23 more than any NFL player has ever had in consecutive seasons.

Only six players in pro football history have caught 100 or more passes in a season. Sharpe, who has led the NFL in receiving in three of his six seasons, is the only one to do it twice.

"The fact that he can catch over 100 passes two years in a row is outstanding, and last year even more so I think because of the fact that he was hurt all year and didn't really get a chance to practice,"



THE RECORD CATCH: Sterling Sharpe cradles football seconds after making his 109th reception of the 1993 season breaking his own NFL single season record. Sharpe caught three other passes in the contest, the Packers' regular season finale against the Detroit Lions January 2, swelling his record to 112.

Packers offensive coordinator Sherman Lewis said. "I think he'd have had an even better year if he'd been healthy."

Indeed, the only thing Sharpe didn't catch in 1993 was a break. He suffered from Achilles' tendinitis early in the season, then sustained a painful turf toe injury at Kansas City in the eighth game. For the rest of the season, he watched practice and ran only on Sundays. His pregame ritual included painkilling shots and a search for a shoe to fit over the steel brace fitted around his toe.

"The most amazing thing is what kind of year he had without ever practicing."

Yet, Sharpe's production never fell off. The week after the Chiefs game, he ran through the New Orleans defense unnoticed and disregarded blurred vision to catch a memorable 54-yard pass from Brett Favre that set up the game-winning field goal against the Saints.Thus began a stretch drive during which Sharpe, more than any single player, carried the Packers to their first playoff berth since 1982.

Sharpe's injury was noticeable only on rare occasions, such as when he simply couldn't catch up to the ball on a deep pass. It might have been because he was a half-step slow due to the injury or because he was exhausted from his forced lack of conditioning. It certainly wasn't for lack of heart.

"The most amazing thing is what kind of year he had without ever practicing," Gruden said. "Here's a guy that plays for 12 or 13 games without ever practicing and has an all-time receiving record in the NFL. That's like a guy winning the Masters' golf tournament without ever hitting a bag of balls before he played. It's amazing what he did."

As amazing as it was during the regular season—112 catches, 1,274 yards, 11 touchdowns—it got even better in the post season. In two playoff games, Sharpe caught 11 passes for 229 yards and four TDs.

One of those playoff touchdowns ranks among the most memorable in Packers history. With the Packers trailing the Detroit Lions, 24-21, in the final minute of the playoff opener at the Silverdome, Sharpe again appeared to make himself invisible as he got 10 yards behind the defense and caught a game-winning 40-yard touchdown pass from Favre.

"The guy's at his best when the chips are on the table and the game is on the line," Gruden said. "You can look at his days at South Carolina, you can look at his days when he first got here, you can look at last year's film, that's when Sterling Sharpe is at his best."

But how in the world does the NFL's leading receiver consistently run through defenses undetected when the game is on the line? It's almost as if he possesses some Klingon "cloaking device" from Star Trek.

A more plausible explanation comes from Lewis.

"It's just somebody (on defense) breaks down," he said. "When Brett starts scrambling he kind of looks for Sterling first, and if he does pop open, it's not like we're going to miss him. And Sterling has that feel. He knows when something's wrong with the coverage. He knows when something is broken down, he'll get open. That's a tribute to him."

As much as his ability to play hurt and make the clutch play show Sharpe's heart, nothing demonstrates his competitiveness more than his ability to run with the ball after the catch. Sharpe caught 83 percent of his passes within 10 yards of the line of scrimmage last season, but averaged 11.4 yards per catch.

"To me, it's an incredible statistic what he does after the catch," said Gruden. "I like to look at the great receivers in all of football—the Michael Irvins, the Sterling Sharpes, the Jerry Rices, the Andre Risons, all those great receivers—to see what they get after the catch, and Sterling's right up there on top of the league."

Lewis feels Sharpe's running ability showcases all of the things that make him great, from his on-field awareness and competitive nature to his considerable physical attributes.

"He has just tremendous strength and balance," Lewis said. "He can stay on his feet and it's just amazing the things that he does. He knows where the first-down markers are all the time and he usually gets there."

While it is inevitable that Sharpe will break Lofton's record this season, he'll do it the way he's always done it. He'll catch however many passes it takes for the Packers to win. On those rare occasions when Sharpe has spoken to the media, he's made it clear that records and money and fame aren't the things that drive him. His only goal is to return the Packers to NFL glory.

But even though the Packers have been accused of forcing the ball to Sharpe, don't expect them to stop. Lewis and coach Mike Holmgren will continue to move Sharpe around, using different formations and motion to keep from zeroing in on him and double-teaming him.

There's an old football saying that goes like this: If you've got a cannon, shoot it. The Packers will just keep shooting their big gun.

"He's head and shoulders better than other receivers we've had," Lewis said, "so we just decided that until somebody stops him, we're going to get the ball to him. People keep saying, 'Well, you're throwing too much to him,' but nobody's really shut him down. Until that happens, we'll just keep going to him."

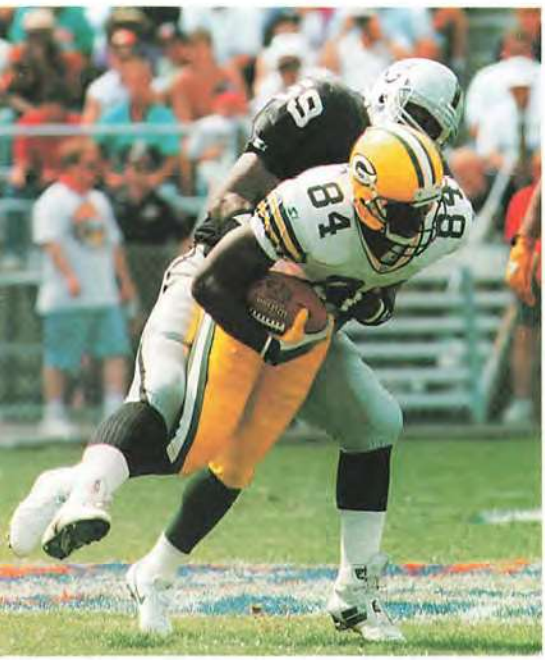
Despite the Packers' reliance on him, Sharpe has maintained incredible consistency. He has caught at least five passes in 31 of the team's last 34 games, including playoff games. Last season, he caught touchdown passes in half of the 16 regular season games and both playoff games.

If he returns in good health from off-season surgery, Sharpe's production could increase even more. Due largely to his injury, the Packers didn't go deep to him much last season. They usually sent him underneath the defense, then dumped the ball to him and watched him run. That game plan should change this year.

RECORD DAY FOR RECORD RECEIVER: Sharpe, breaking into the open, is enroute to one of his four receiving touchdowns at Tampa October 24, a collection which tied a 48-year-old Packer record, set by Don Hutson in 1945.

"I think we've got to get the ball downfield to him a little bit more," Lewis said. "I think we've got to get him the ball where he's on the move. Last year, he caught a lot of balls, but we threw a lot of stuff where he was standing still when he caught it, on hooks and stops and spot routes. I'd like to get him the ball a little more on the run. I think he'll be even more effective and make us a little better offensively."

And put Sharpe right where he belongs in the Packers record book—at the top.



STERLING STUFF: One of Sterling Sharpe's primary assets is his surprising strength, enabling him to consistantly gain additional yardage after the catch, as demonstrated above.

IS BROOKS THE ONE?

Bud Lea
The Milwaukee Sentinel

A year ago, he was wondering about his future with the Green Bay Packers. Robert Brooks, a third-round draft choice in 1992, was just another young, struggling wide receiver.

He wasn't thinking about how many passes he would catch. He was thinking survival.

He was just trying to keep his job as a backup. He didn't know if he was going to be with the Packers week to week, or day to day.

Sterling Sharpe, the record-breaking veteran, was the main man. Mark Clayton, the former Miami Dolphins star, was brought in to be the opposite wide receiver.

Brooks had outstanding speed, but he didn't seem to avoid or take hits very well. He also tended to drop a ball under duress, and he had trouble finding the dead spot in the zone.

Welcome to wide receiver, the most difficult position from which to excel. Everyone else on the field must perform before the receiver can.

Robert Brooks, looked upon as the leading candidate to complement Sterling Sharpe at wide receiver, is shown making one of his three receptions in the Packers' divisional playoff game at Dallas. The linebacker he is straining to elude is Dixon Edwards (58).

The linemen must block, the backs must decoy, the quarterback must put the ball on target, and the whole thing, of course, depends on the coach having called a decent play in the first place. Only after all this can a receiver shine.

Robert Brooks rode the bench. He became the target of the media that kept insisting he would never make it. Everything that was negative was said about him.

He felt the criticism was undeserved. He couldn't change opinions if he wasn't playing. So, he decided to handle things his own way.

"People started believing everything the media was saying about me," he said. "They really didn't know what was going on. I decided I wouldn't talk."

Instead of sticking around the locker room, he went home and sat down at his keyboard. Brooks is an accomplished composer and owns his own record company.

Brooks feeds off good vibrations. He believes in positive thinking, He also has come to believe that he has to make the best of every situation.

And that's what happened last January. In a playoff game against the Dallas Cowboys, Brooks silenced the Texas Stadium crowd by having the best game of his two-year career with the Packers. Replacing Clayton for much of the second half, he caught three passes for 39 yards, including a spectacular 13-yard touchdown in traffic.

Brooks made a tough catch of a high-velocity slant pass from Brett Favre for nine yards on third and six. Then he stretched out to snag the touchdown against Larry Brown. On his third reception, he drove Brown off a deep comeback route for a 17-yard gain. And, as a punt returner, he brought back a punt for a career-long 43 yards.

"That's the player they drafted," Brooks said. "That's the player I am.

"They drafted a player who could play under pressure, who could make the big catch, the go-to guy. That's the kind of player I want to be. And that's the kind of player I'm going to be this year."

Sherm Lewis, the Packers' offensive coordinator who came from the San Francisco system, hopefully looks at Brooks as another John Taylor (of the 49ers). Many experts believe Jerry Rice and Taylor are the best one-two wide receiver combination in the NFL.

"Taylor didn't catch many balls, but when he caught them he made things happen," Lewis said. "He can take that short pass and turn it into a long gain.

"Because Rice was getting so much attention, Taylor was getting one-on-one attention so we could single him out on somebody. I believe we can do that with Brooks.

"He has shown he's an excellent open field runner with his punt returns and kickoff returns. I'm looking for Brooks to have a big season—not necessarily 65-70 catches: Maybe 45 catches. But I think those yards-per-catch will be high."

"I don't care about statistics. Money. I'm playing on pride. I know what I can do. I have something to prove."

Like Brooks, the 6 foot 1, 185-pound Taylor was a third-round draft choice, selected in 1986 out of Delaware State. Brooks weighs only 174 pounds but is wiry and tough.

But Brooks' body took a beating late in the season. When the coaching staff talked of working him into games more, he suffered a separated shoulder at Chicago on Dec. 5, which caused him to miss the next two games. Even though he returned for the final two regular season games, he was less than 100%.

"I know (coach Mike Holmgren) said during the course of the year he was going to get more and more playing time," General Manager Ron Wolf said. "Then he got hurt. That was the difference."

Welcome to Soldier Field, the place of cold winds off the lake, hyper fans, and big, tough cookies on defense you can't turn your back on. Brooks paid the price when he was leveled by Mark Carrier, the Bears' 6-1, 192-pound safety.

"I thought it was an illegal hit," Brooks said. "I was running a slant route, and the ball was still in the air when he (Carrier) hit me in the back with his helmet."

You've got to hand it to Brooks. The man came back. The man can play.

He has remarkable speed. He can catch the ball. And if he hits the open field, his acceleration is breathtaking.

Brooks led the NFL in kickoff returns with a 26.6-yard average and would have finished sixth in the NFC in punt returns (8.4) if he had had enough returns to qualify. He said returning kicks comes natural and is easy as one-two-three.

As a receiver, however, he caught 20 passes for 180 yards. And his average per catch on 32 career receptions is only 9.6 yards.

What's more important? Number of catches, or number of yards per catch?

"Neither," Brooks said.

"I don't care about statistics. Money. I'm playing on pride. I know what I can do.

"I have something to prove."

Brooks followed Sharpe at South Carolina. Sharpe had set all of those records with the Gamecocks.

After his senior year, Brooks had caught 19 touchdown passes to break Sharpe's previous mark of 17. He also established an all-time South Carolina record with 76 career kickoff returns.

"I was the go-to guy in college," he said. "I was the guy they went to with the game on the line. I was going to get 12-15 balls thrown to me per game. No matter what.

"I got a wakeup call when I got to Green Bay because the players were so much better. Physically, I was ready to play. Mentally, I wasn't.

"Having Sterling on the team wasn't an issue. In fact, it made me a better player. It made me more comfortable just having a guy from home there."

So are these bad times in the life of Robert Brooks? No way, he says. These are good times.

Clayton is gone. The Packers didn't put a high priority on getting a wide receiver in the draft. They are banking on Brooks being the complementary receiver to Sharpe.

"His potential is unlimited," Clayton said. "He knows he can play in this league. He knows as much as I do about what it takes to be topnotch. He's just waiting for a chance. He'll get it."

Brooks is ready. You can tell it by looking at him. It is refreshing to see him with a smile, to see him talking of his plans.

"I want them to put some weight on my shoulders and say, 'We're going to put the ball in Brooks' hands and see what he can do about it,' " he said.

Forget the slow start. It's not where you start; it's where you finish.

Brooks, here relaxing on the sideline, has "unlimited potential" according to 1993 teammate Mark Clayton, himself a 5-time Pro Bowl receiver.

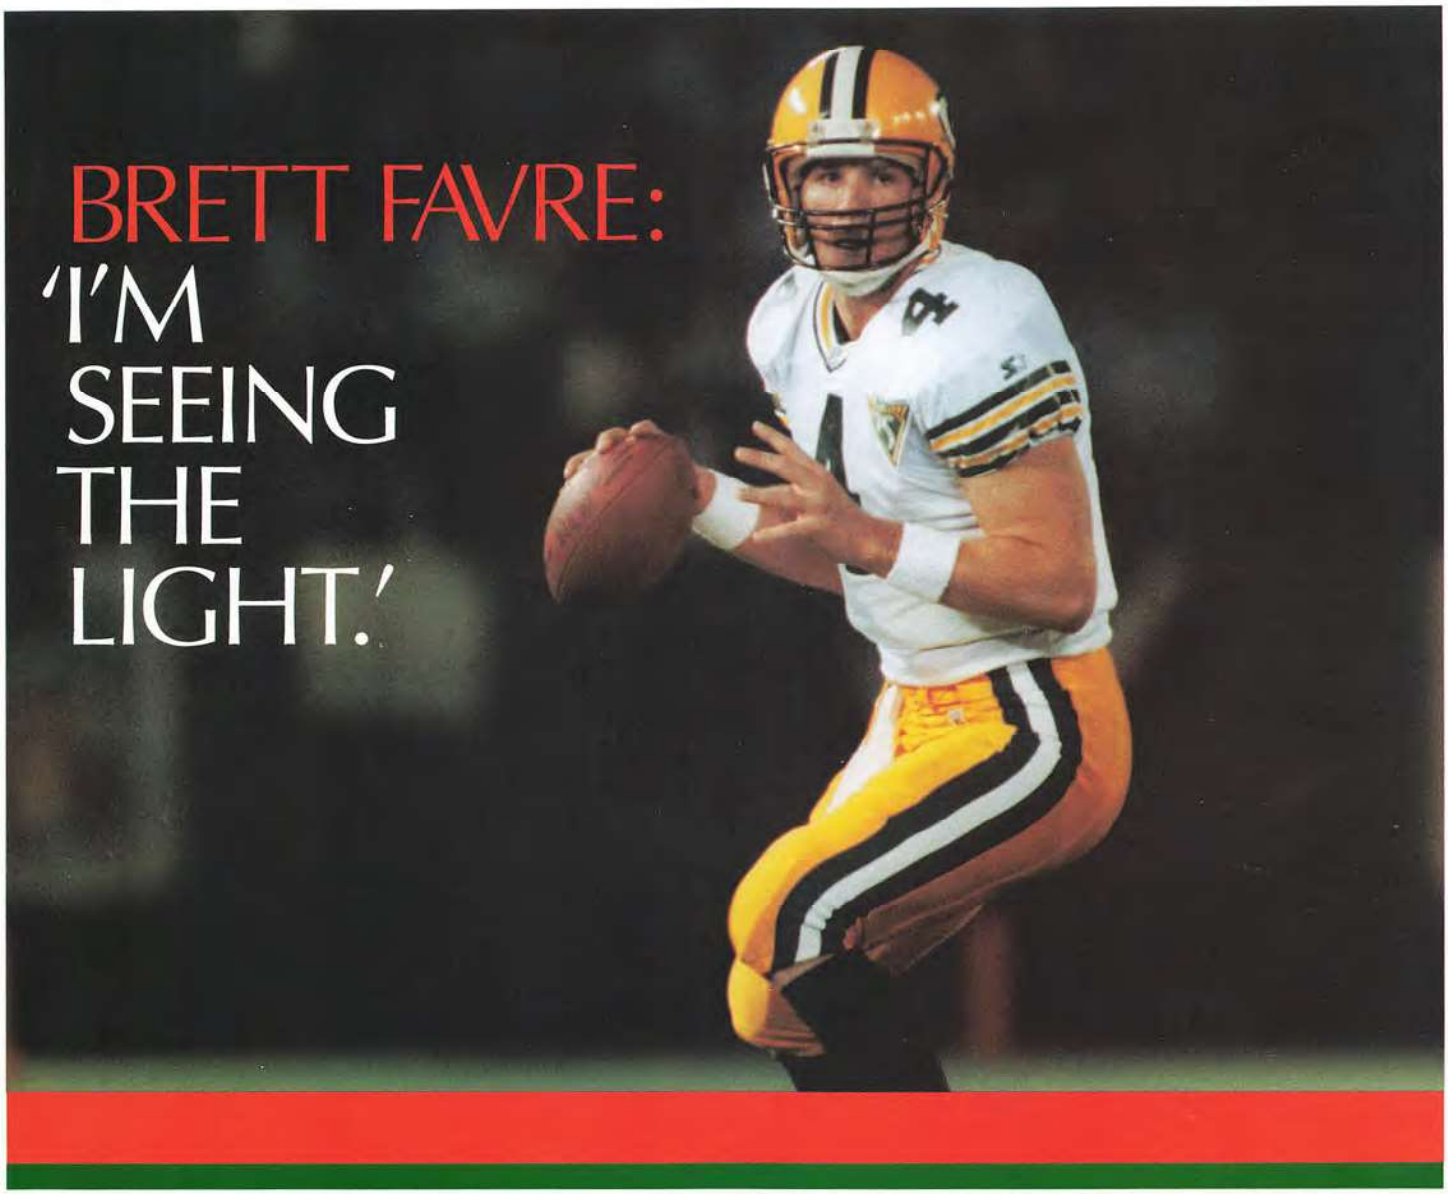
BRETT FAVRE: 'I'M SEEING THE LIGHT.'



ALL-TIME LEADER: Quarterback Brett Favre became the leading percentage in Packer history in 1993. His 62.4 mark (on 620 completions in 993 attempts), surpassed Bart Starr's longtime record 57.42 pct.. Favre also became the first quarterback in Packer annals to complete 300 passes (318 in '93) in 2 seasons.

Chris Havel
Green Bay Press-Gazette

Brett Favre was relaxing at his parents' home in Kiln, Miss., one day after an off-season morning workout when he spotted one of the National Football League pre-season publications his father, Irvin, has a habit of collecting.

Naturally, the Green Bay Packers' starting quarterback thumbed straight to the NFC Central Division preview.

Then he thumbed his nose.

"They had us picked behind the Chicago Bears," he said, wrinkling up his face. "If anybody had been picked ahead of us, I would've figured on the Minnesota Vikings. But you know, I feel like we're the team to beat."

Many preseason publications disagree, with this disclaimer: If the Packers are going to take that step to the next level, Favre's decision-making has got to improve. Indeed, much of the Packers' fortunes in 1994 rest not only upon Favre's shoulders but upon the head that sits between them.

"The number one thing for me is probably understanding our overall offense a little bit better. And I think I know it pretty damn good now."

The 24-year-old quarterback believes he's constantly making progress. He said everything really came together for him during a seven-on-seven passing drill on the final day of the team's June minicamp.

"Coach (Mike) Holmgren, the receivers, everyone was saying, 'Boy, you're really seeing things today.' It wasn't just throwing. It was reaction. I've been thinking a lot about that since then.

"Four or five years from now, who knows what can stop me? I'll be doing things second nature. Before, I used to throw with my arm. Now I'm throwing with my head. That one day changed things for me."

The big change he's looking for is cutting down on interceptions. He threw for an NFL-high 24 last season. Tampa Bay's Craig Erickson and Houston's Warren Moon, now with Minnesota, were next with 21.

Favre's 24 interceptions drew a significant amount of publicity, in part because he only threw 15 in 1992, his first season with the Packers.

Naturally, the Packers' faithful duly noted each pick with hoots and hollers. With Favre on the verge of signing a multi-million dollar contract, he knows the fans' expectations are only going to become greater.

But he gives them credit for being the NFL's most knowledgeable fans.

"I don't think the first interception I throw they're going to boo their heads off and say, 'He got paid too much.' They know every pass isn't going to go for a big gain or a touchdown.

"They also know I want to win every bit as much as they do. Probably more. I'd be lying if I said I don't want to make everyone happy when I step onto the field. I do. And I think we will."

Quarterbacks coach Steve Mariucci sees Favre progressing.

"The interceptions is all anyone seems to want to talk about," he said. "But obviously there were a lot of good things that Brett did, too."

Favre claims the only statistic that truly interests him is wins. He has won 18 of 30 regular-season starts (60 percent) in two seasons with the Packers. He is one of only seven quarterbacks who didn't miss a start in 1993.

What he'd like to do is combine the best of his first two seasons in Green Bay for a new and improved performance in 1994. He'd also like to have the chance to throw deep more often. He said some of the Packers' biggest wins, such as their playoff victory at Detroit, were aided by long passes.

"I hope we go into a game thinking we're going to take three or four shots downfield," he said. "That's what I do best. So why throw short all the time? Sure, I'll throw an interception or two, but we can stretch the defenses. I think coach (Mike Holmgren) is getting more faith in me all the time. I think you'll see more of those (deep) passes this season."

As it was, the 24-year-old put up a splendid array of statistics in 1993.

He became the first quarterback in Packers history to complete 300 or more passes in two seasons, the second to post two 3,000-yard seasons and the third to throw for more than 400 yards in a game.

The result was the Packers' second straight 9-7 record for the franchise's first back-to-back winning seasons since 1966 and 1967. They also advanced to the second round of the playoffs before losing to Super Bowl champion Dallas.

For Favre, the reward was a second consecutive trip to the Pro Bowl. It was an honor, to be sure, but it alone won't be good enough this time around. His goals for 1994 include winning the NFC Central Division championship, dethroning the Cowboys in the playoffs and reaching the Super Bowl.

ON THE RUN: A capable runner when necessary, Favre was the Packers' No. 3 rusher last season, gaining 216 yards in 58 carries, a 3.7-yard average. Here the runaway quarterback keeps a wary eye on an approaching Detroit Lion.

He believes the Cowboys, a team that's seen head coach Jimmy Johnson and several talented free agents depart, are still strong but not dominant.

"The last two years, I think Dallas has been the strongest team I've ever seen. They had the complete package and they kept everybody healthy. Don't get me wrong. They've still got a lot of weapons, but they're not as good as they were."

How good can the Packers be this season? Favre's got his ideas.

"I'm looking at 12-4, 13-3 this season," he said. "If we get to the second round of the playoffs and lose again, the fans won't accept that. And they should be disappointed. If we stay reasonably healthy, I think we can make a run for it. Last year, we probably were saying, 'Let's get to the playoffs.'

"Now we've done that. We've picked up some more guys with experience. I'd be lying if I told you I didn't think we had a chance to go all the way."

THE DON HUTSON CENTER:

by Al Pahl
Ray Nitschke's Packer Report

Some things just make sense.

If you are building what you believe to be the finest indoor practice facility in the football world, doesn't it make sense to name it after the player you believe to have been your team's greatest ever?

That's why the Packers' indoor practice facility is named The Don Hutson Center.

"People always referred to the old building as 'the barn,'" Packer President Bob Harlan said. "I kept telling people, 'We are not going to spend $4 million and have this building called a barn.'

"I decided to take advantage of the tradition that was here. We have some great, great names.

"We had already found out that once we put the names of our Pro Football Hall of Fame inductees on the walls on the inside of Lambeau Field, it created a lot of conversation; people really brought out the storied tradition that exists here," Harlan said. "I thought the same thing should be true of this building: Let's name it after the player whom everyone regards as the greatest to ever play for the Packers and certainly one of the greatest in the history of the NFL."

Which is just fine with the 81-year-old former wide receiver, who still holds eleven NFL records—nearly a half-century after his retirement.

"It's quite an honor for me," Hutson said during a telephone interview from his Rancho Mirage, Calif. home. He admitted that no player in his day (1935-45) could ever have imagined such a facility.

And the honor sits just fine with his wife Julia, who, it turns out, was actually the Hutson to give the go-ahead on the naming.

"I wanted to call Don first, and make sure he would not have any objections, before I even went to our Executive Committee," Harlan explained. "I called his house in California and his wife answered. I told her what we were going to do: Build an indoor-practice facility we thought would be the finest in the world. There wouldn't be anything that would compare to this. And I'd like to name it after her husband.

"She says, 'Well, he's not here right now but I'm old enough—I'll give you permission to do that.'

"Don called me personally the very next day and told me he was really very pleased and honored," Harlan recalled. "I told him how pleased I was he would do this for us because this would really add some significance to our building.

"I'm really excited. (Hutson's name) adds such dignity to the building. I just really got tired of that 'barn' designation."

A couple of weeks later, one of Hutson's daughters phoned Harlan. "She said, 'My Dad is so pleased and excited about this building that he would really like to be able to come back to Green Bay, if you are going to have an official opening,'" Harlan recounted.

Enter John Bergstrom, a Fox Valley millionaire who owns several northeastern Wisconsin auto dealerships and hotels. The morning of the Center's dedication, his corporate jet picked up the Hutsons in southern California and returned them home that same evening.

General Manager Ron Wolf and Head Coach Mike Holmgren joined the Hutsons as the first people to enter the building during the dedication ceremonies.

Which also just made sense—since The Don Hutson Center was originally Wolf's idea and since both men helped design it.

Harlan explains: "As we were finishing off the (Administration Building's) gymnasium and running track a little over a year ago, Ron said these facilities are truly outstanding. The only area where we might be a little short—particularly with free agency coming—is with our indoor-practice facility."

Harlan went along with Wolf because "We told him when he was hired that the football program was his to run and we would see to it that he and Mike had what they needed to build a sound program."

The general manager and head coach then met with architect Bill Doyle of Green Bay's Berners-Schober Associates Inc. "What we really wanted to do here was let the people who use the building design it," Harlan explained. "Ron and Mike, the video department, the training staff, the equipment staff—the people who were going to be in there every day—we wanted them to all have input."

Which no doubt helps explain why The Don Hutson Center includes an equipment room, training room and even a coaches' meeting room.

"We didn't put any boundaries on it as far as cost," Harlan said. "We told them to do what they needed to—that we wanted it to be the best."

Wolf sent Doyle to the college practice facilities he liked best: Ohio State, Michigan, Notre Dame. The architect not only inspected the buildings, he met with those who used them, asking for the bad points as well as the good points.

"We tried to take all the good points and put them into our building," Harlan said.

The most challenging part of the project for Doyle was integrating the building's sheer size into its environment. "We were taking, obviously, a very large building and trying to make it a pleasant neighbor," Doyle explained. "We didn't want it to just be a large envelope. We wanted to develop pieces which would downplay the size. We wanted to make it more consistent with other buildings in the community."

No doubt about it—the size is overwhelming.

The west side of the building is 452 feet long. The north side, 230, and the south side, 270. All of which adds up to 112,400 square feet. The former facility totaled 55,000 square feet.

The roof over the 60-yard-long north-south field is 85 feet high while the roof over the 70-yard east-west field is 90 feet. The approximate volume of the building is 9,796,100 cubic feet. The volume of the former facility was 3,588,000 cubic feet.

The dramatic increase in volume is explained by the much higher roof. "There is an almost 50-percent increase in height," Doyle pointed out. "We went from 65 to 85 and then to 90."

The building covers 2.5 acres.

And could hold what? "The best explanation I like to give people which really hits home with them is that you could park two 747 jumbo jets inside," said Harlan.

(A 747 is 195 feet, eight inches wide; 231 feet, 10 inches long and 63 feet, 5 inches high. Only one would have fit in the team's old practice facility.)

"I think it's pretty exciting, to be honest," Doyle said. "In terms of volume of space, there probably are not a whole lot of buildings bigger anywhere.

"We wanted to do it so that it would have a positive appeal to the community as a physical object out there. That was the challenge."

The indoor challenge: A two-acre floor which resembles grass as closely as possible.

Answer: An unusual woven polypropylene more forgiving than most artificial surfaces. It greatly reduces the probability of rug burns.

More importantly, its resiliency is much greater than most artificial surfaces because there's no concrete underneath. It covers one-and-a-half inches of rubberized asphalt—ground up recycled tires mixed with fine gravel granules, held together by asphalt. It's laid down hot, just like a road.

The football-field markings are woven right into the polypropylene.

Then there was the letters' challenge:

Plans called for the identifying lettering on the west side to be eight feet high. But that size ran afoul of ordinances in the Village of Ashwaubenon.

Original plans called for a sign measuring 720 square feet—some 570 square feet larger than zoning codes allowed.

Village ordinances were initially interpreted to limit letters to a height of six feet, four inches. Later calculations by Village officials found the letters would have to be even shorter.

"It was getting a little ridiculous, with the size of the building," Village President Ted Pamperin said during March's debates.

The Village code is too restrictive and doesn't accomodate unusually tall buildings said Pamperin, adding, "If you just look at the building, a small size on that would just be out of place."

In early March, the Village's Zoning Board of Appeals voted to deny the variance request. But by late April, Pamperin had successfully led the fight—without any pressure from the Packers, he and they say—to change the ordinance so that now buildings with eaves more than 45 feet above the ground will be considered on a case-by-case basis.

"We stayed out of it totally," Harlan said. "Ted called me and said it was silly to fight about it. He said we had this big, beautiful building and it didn't make sense to put letters on it you couldn't read. He said it was a minute ordinance and this is a building that will represent the Village. He went back to the group that voted it down and it passed."

Not only does Hutson's name adorn the outside of the building in eight-foot letters, a framed Hutson jersey hangs inside.

"What's really nice about it," said Harlan, "is this is the 75th anniversary of the NFL and the history of the League is very important this year. Here now, one of the greatest names to ever play—and a man I know is going to be named to all of the all-time teams—came back here and did something. Fox TV Network and Sports Illustrated have shown interest in doing something (on Hutson and the building). It's a nice time to do it and honor a fine athlete, a fine man."

It just makes sense.

THE HUTSON RECORD

Don Hutson is 81 years old and hasn't played football in nearly 50 years, but still holds 11 National Football League records:

- Most seasons leading the League in touchdown receptions, 9, 1935-38, 1940-44;
- Most consecutive seasons leading the League in touchdown receptions, 5, 1940-44;
- Most seasons leading the League in receptions, 8, 1936-37, 1939, 1941-45;
- Most consecutive seasons leading the League in receptions, 5, 1941-45;
- Most seasons leading the League in receiving yards, 7, 1936, 1938-39, 1941-44;
- Most consecutive seasons leading the League in receiving yards, 4, 1941-44;
- Most seasons leading the League in scoring, 5, 1940-44;
- Most consecutive seasons leading the League in scoring, 5, 1940-44;
- Most seasons leading the League in touchdowns, 8, 1935-38, 1941-44;
- Most consecutive seasons leading the League in touchdowns, 4, 1935-38, 1941-44;
- Most points scored in one quarter, 29 (4 TD, 5 PAT, Oct. 7, 1945), vs. Detroit at Milwaukee.

A charter enshrinee in the Pro Football Hall of Fame when it opened in 1963, Hutson is credited with inventing pass patterns, a development which revolutionized the passing game after the University of Alabama All-American signed with the Packers in 1935.

He subsequently became the most dominant offensive force in professional football over his 11-year career, 1935-45.

One of the most prolific scorers in NFL annals, Hutson posted 105 touchdowns in 117 games, 99 of them through the air, a total which stood as a League record for 44 years—until surpassed by Seattle's Steve Largent in 1989 (100) and by San Francisco's Jerry Rice, who totaled 103 by the end of the 1992 season and now has 118.

So dominant was Hutson that pro football writer Peter King of Sports Illustrated, following extensive research, described Hutson as the greatest player in pro football history in his book, "Football, A History of the Professional Game."

Possessor of the most prominent name in Packer archives—it is listed 67 times in the club's media guide in recognition of his numerous records and accomplishments—he still holds Packer records for:

- Most career points scored, 823;
- Most points scored in one quarter, 29;
- Most career touchdowns, 105;
- Most receptions in a game, 14;
- Most touchdown receptions in one season, 17;
- Most games with 200 or more receiving yards, 4;
- Most seasons leading the team in receiving, 10.
- He also set and now shares (with Sterling Sharpe) the team record for most TD receptions in one game, 4.

A FEW OF THE MANY: Don Hutson, shown during his playing days (1935-45), cradles a collection of footballs which symbolize his legendary productivity as a pass receiver. Hutson caught a then-NFL-record 488 passes over his 11 Packer seasons and his 99 receiving touchdowns during this span stood as a pro football record for 44 years.

The Green Bay Packers approached the first year of unrestricted free agency like a starving man attacking a smorgasbord.

They filled their plate repeatedly, gorging themselves with seven signings, the most of any team in the National Football League. They went after main dishes like defensive end Reggie White and guard Harry Galbreath, side orders like free safety Mike Prior, offensive tackle Tunch Ilkin and nose tackle Bill Maas, even a little dessert in wide receivers Louis Clark and Mark Clayton, their final signings prior to training camp.

By the time they pushed themselves away from the buffet, they were feeling stuffed, but satisfied.

This year, the Packers ordered strictly ala carte. Forced to count calories-along with everybody else in the first year of the league's salary cap, they picked over the entrees and came away with defensive end Sean Jones and running back Reggie Cobb. They later added longtime Chicago defensive tackle Steve McMichael.

And you know what? This year's meal may prove to be every bit as satisfying. After all, didn't your mother always tell you to leave the table feeling a little hungry?

While this year's free-agent class may be somewhat lacking in numbers compared to that first group in 1993, general manager Ron Wolf predicts that it could carry a similar wallop.

"If things work out as we hope, they will have as much impact as last year's free agents," Wolf said.

This is the way of free agency under the salary cap, set at $34.6 million per team this season. Most teams had to be much more selective this year.

"Last year, we jumped in with both boots on," Wolf said.

This year, the Packers waded in cautiously, spending the bulk of their energies on trying to protect their own free agents.

"If we can do something like this every year," Packers President Bob Harlan said. "Fill a couple needs, particularly in spots where we feel we won't find a lot of help in the draft, I think we can do very well. Then, hopefully, we won't lose a lot of people and you can keep most of your club intact."

The Packers did not make it through free agency unscathed. They lost two quality young players in linebacker Tony Bennett and tight end Jackie Harris. But Wolf knew there would be some losses given the current system. The trick is to come out ahead, with gains outweighing the losses, which the Packers believe they have done.

"You're probably going to lose a couple (players) every year," Harlan said. "We know that. We accept it. That's just the way the game is now. I've always maintained, regardless of what we go through or how we have to fight to make the cap work, we're still better off with the cap there than if we didn't have the cap."

RON WOLF COPES WITH THE CAP– THE 'NEW FOOTBALL'

Ron Wolf, right, whose forays into the unrestricted free agent market have been highly productive for the Packers, compares notes with offensive coordinator Sherman Lewis on the practice field.

Jones, from Houston, was deemed the perfect bookend to White in the defensive line and the No. 1 target from the start of this year's free-agency signing period. And Wolf has shown an uncanny knack for getting the people he targets.

"He picks out targets, he goes after them and he's very convincing," Harlan said. "When we bring the players to town I think what sells them are: the people, when the coaches and Ron sit down with them; then they see the facilities and our intent, where this organization is headed. I think they're just convinced this would be a good place to play football."

The signing of White last year set the tone. The Packers showed they would be aggressive pursuers of top talent in free agency and that they could compete with anybody.

"I think last year when everybody heard about Green Bay and Reggie White, they didn't believe it," Harlan said. "He proved a large point for us, even if he had never stepped on the field. He proved quality players will find Green Bay a good place to play football. That removed a huge obstacle for us."

Both Jones and Cobb reinforced that notion. A 30-minute conversation with Packers Coach Mike Holmgren was all Jones needed to convince himself he could be happy here.

"I said to him, a lot of people around the league last year may have said, 'Why did Reggie White come to Green Bay?'" Jones said. "I said to (Holmgren), 'After sitting down speaking to you, now I understand why.'"

Wolf, however, was in something of a bind, with key unsigned players of his own to worry about in Harris and especially quarterback Brett Favre. Until Wolf knew what was happening with Favre, a restricted free agent,, he couldn't commit to free agents from other teams.

So for the first two months of free agency, while their closest rivals in the NFC Central Division all made key free-agent acquisitions, the Packers were forced to anxiously bide their time.

"With Brett not signed and Harris not signed, we had a lot of question marks," Harlan said. "Because of that, Ron really had to sit back for a long time—which I know made him very uncomfortable.

"What he did this year was focus on a couple of people and he said that's who we're going to go after and if we get those two we're fine. These are the two we went after and these are the two we got."

The Packers finally struck in the week before the draft, signing both Jones and Cobb. McMichael, a bargain who was simply to good to pass up, came later in June.

Jamie Dukes, an offensive center/guard with the Atlanta Falcons, and Fred Strickland, a linebacker with the Vikings, were signed in early July. Guy McIntyre, the 5-time Pro Bowler from the San Francisco 49ers was signed the week prior to the opening of training camp.

Cobb was originally protected by Tampa Bay as a transition player. When the Buccaneers removed that designation in a cost-cutting measure, the Packers made their play and wooed him away.

"It was an area (running back) we knew we had to get into and here was a guy we really liked," Wolf said.

Cobb thought enough of the Packers organization and a chance to be with a winner that he turned down more money from Tampa Bay.

Still, nothing speaks louder about the job the Packers have done in free agency the last two season than the signings of White and Jones. Defensive end is a critical position on a football team and it's one of the spots that's toughest to fill.

In two years, the Packers were able to secure two Pro Bowl players who have combined for 225 1/2 career sacks. It is believed that is the highest total for two teammates since the NFL started keeping sacks as an official statistic in 1982.

While the two came with hefty price tags, with the help of White's front-loaded deal the Packers signed them without mortgaging their future or gutting the rest of their team.

"We wanted to build the ballclub as quickly as we could and this was one way to do it," Harlan said.

Wolf admits that without free agency, the Packers would never have been able to add established players the caliber of White and Jones.

"It remains to be seen (how things work out)," Wolf said. "As we get into this and the more we become familiar with it, the better we'll be able to operate."

Some might argue Wolf seems to be operating just fine right now.

It's a delicate balancing act, trying to pinpoint where to best use a limited amount of money. The salary cap has also reduced a general manager's room for error. He can no longer afford to make many mistakes.

"I'm thankful every day we've got Ron Wolf," Harlan said. "It's a stern test for general managers. I think if you don't have a quality guy in that job right now you're going to be in a lot of trouble."

Offensive guard Ed King, here dressing for practice, is one of the Packers' most prominent free agent additions of 1994. The former Cleveland Brown is counted upon to start at left guard.

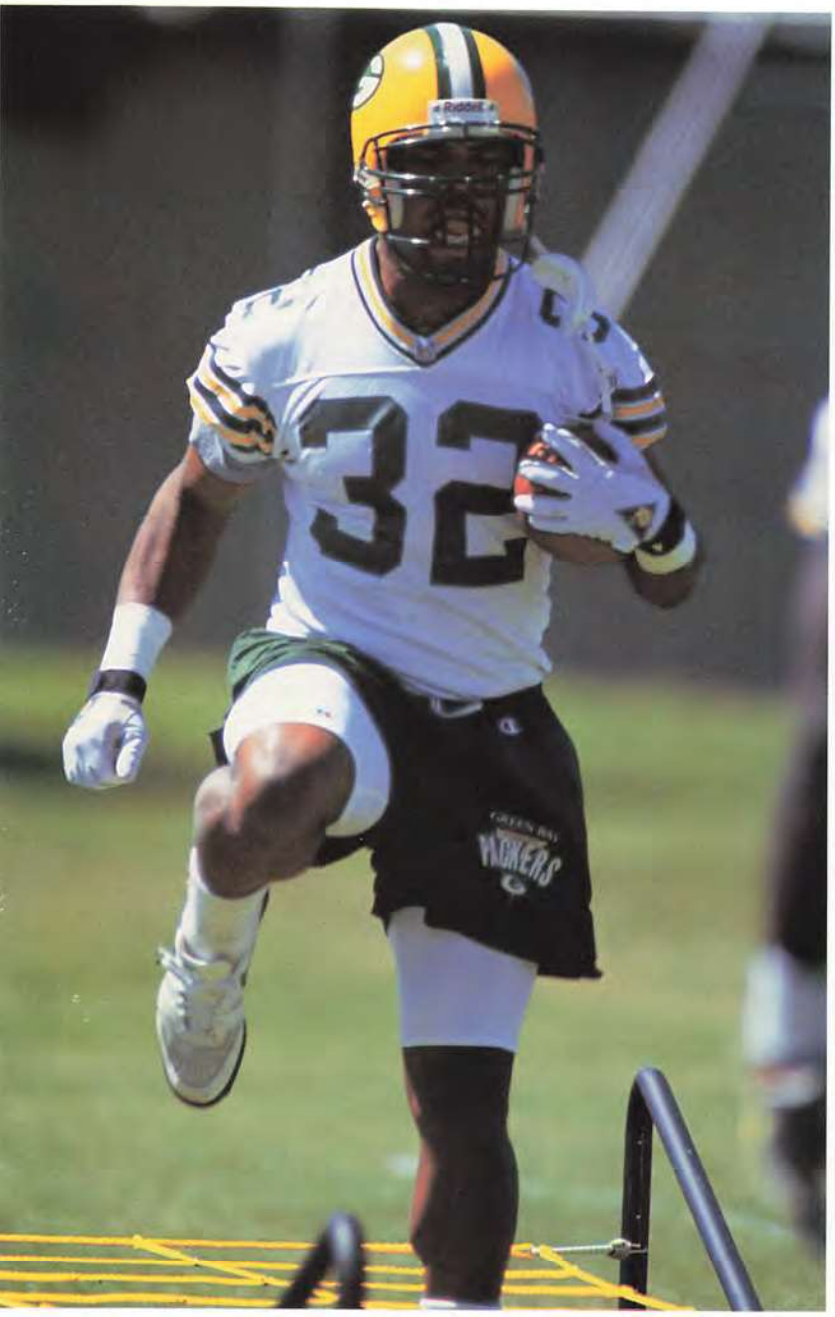
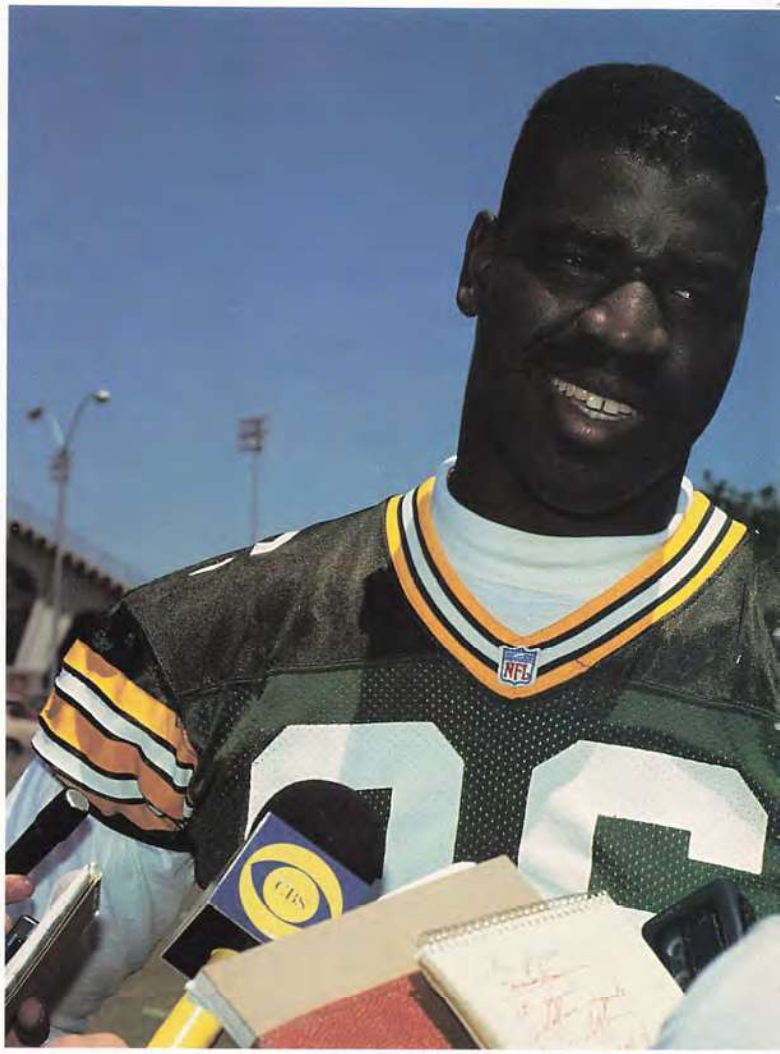
KEY ADDITIONS COBB AND JONES: WE CAME TO



Reggie Cobb, high-stepping through an agility drill, is counted upon to upgrade the running game. The ex-Tampa Bay Buccaneer, signed as an unrestricted free agent, rushed for 1,171 yards in 1992.



Sean Jones, shown meeting the Wisconsin media for the first time during an Arizona mini-camp, represents a major addition to the Packer defense. Looked upon as a pass-rushing complement to Reggie White, the former Oiler ranks among the NFL's premier sack artists with a career total of 88 1/2.

by Tom Mulhern
Appleton Post-Crescent

They have come, the two of them, from different times in their careers, but in search of many of the same things.

A chance to be successful. The feeling of being wanted. Financial rewards.

But, ultimately, what they most want is the chance to call themselves champions.

Free agency has brought defensive end Sean Jones and running back Reggie Cobb to Green Bay, to fresh starts, to what they believe will be new heights in already impressive football careers.

The Packers, meanwhile, believe these two additions address glaring needs and could be the players to help push them over the top.

In Jones, they now have help for Reggie White in the defensive line.

"We've got somebody that can really, really complement Reggie White," general manager Ron Wolf says. "Somebody on the other side (of the defensive line) that offenses have to be concerned with. We've got the real deal in Sean Jones. We ought to be able to tattoo the quarterback."

In Cobb, the Packers may finally have the running threat they have searched so long for.

"He's not the type of guy that's going to electrify you, making those long Barry Sanders-type runs," Wolf says. "But he'll turn a 3-yard run into a 9-yard run and get the first down when you need it. Those are the things that are very, very important."

WIN

Both Jones and Cobb were recruited, in part, by White.

Jones spoke with White at the Pro Bowl following last season. What kind of recruiter was White?

"I'm here," Jones says. "It didn't hurt."

Cobb, who like White went to college at Tennessee, spoke with White while trying to decide between Tampa Bay and Green Bay.

"Reggie told me a lot about the organization and things," Cobb says. "One thing he told me, he said his last year in Philadelphia he wasn't happy. When he came here he was a lot happier. He said it's a big difference playing when you're happy. I thought about that and I thought about how much better I'd feel here, a place where I'm comfortable."

The two of them, Jones and Cobb, come from different situations, to be sure. But both are escaping something, and looking for something better.

Although outstanding players in their own right, both shun the label of "savior." Both just want to fit into the big picture.

"No, no, no. I'm not here to stop Reggie from getting double-teamed," Jones says, joking with reporters. "I hope that'll continue. Everybody will hopefully double and triple-team him and I won't get blocked at all."

When Cobb is asked if he feels pressure to be an offensive savior, he defers to a couple names that have been here longer.

"That's Sterling Sharpe's job," he says "and Jackie (Harris) and Brett (Favre). Those are your Pro Bowlers there. I'm just kind of a piece of the puzzle."

If Jones and Cobb are the right pieces, then everything they are looking for may indeed come true.

SEAN JONES

"Emancipation" is the way Jones, 31, describes his departure from Houston, where he played the last six years.

Often at odds with management during his time with the Oilers over contracts and a variety of other matters, Jones felt like he was always swimming against the tide. No more.

"For the first time since probably 1985, when I played with the Raiders, I'm going into training camp with a clear mind," Jones says. "All I've got to do is focus on football. It's the first time I can just go into a season and play, not worry about all the madness and arguing, all this defending of my character. It's not necessary."

Jones admits he was regarded as something of an "enigma" with the Oilers. He claims it was easier for people to hang that label on him than to try to get to know him.

"You become an enigma to people when they don't take the time to find out what you're all about," he says. "I just try to be myself. I haven't changed that much. One instance I was a rabble rouser. Another instance I was a team leader. Some people say I'm outspoken. I just don't see why if someone asks you a question you can't give them a straight answer."

Jones thought about joining the Packers for two years, dating back to Wolf's arrival. When Wolf was in the personnel department with the Los Angeles Raiders in 1984 he played a big part in the drafting of Jones in the second round.

The Raiders were without a first-round pick that year and the United States Football League had stripped the draft of several top players. Jones was a largely unheralded player out of tiny Northeastern.

"We had to somehow find a player we could convince (Raiders owner) Al Davis to take," Wolf recalls. "It didn't take very much to sell (Davis) after we showed him a couple tapes (of Jones)."

Wolf knew Jones well enough to consider his strong personality a plus, not a minus.

"I think you need somebody like that in the locker room," Wolf says.

There has never been any debate about Jones' talents as a football player.

He has 88 1/2 career sacks. Last year, when he finished with 13 sacks, he was named to his first Pro Bowl after being the first alternate the previous two years.

At 6-7, his lanky frame is a little reminiscent of Ed "Too Tall" Jones, who played with Dallas in the 1970s and '80s.

"I don't have the power base that Reggie does," Jones says. "I just try to use what God gave me. Try to be a little bit smarter than most people out there."

Despite all the turmoil in his career, Jones says nobody ever questioned his desire or effort on the field.

"All through my career, the ups and downs, different situations no one has ever criticized me for not playing football," he says. "In fact, people always marveled at the fact I could still play and excel in such an air of uncertainty and instability."

Jones signed a three-year contract, which also happens to be the number of years remaining on White's deal. Both players talk passionately about wanting to win a Super Bowl title before their careers are over.

"I couldn't end my career any better," Jones says. "The only things left for me to do are in this order: Come up to Green Bay and not screw it up for a good team. I've got to come in there and fit in, that's the first thing. The second thing is just go ahead and win this whole damn thing. The third thing is make the Pro Bowl in the NFC. In that order.

"You get a hell of a lot more compliments when you don't care who gets the credit."

REGGIE COBB

Cobb, 26, has no hard feelings about the four seasons he spent in Tampa Bay.

But he turned down an offer of more money from the Buccaneers to come to Green Bay.

In the last four years, Tampa Bay's record was 19-45.

The constant losing can beat a man down, just as surely as the constant bickering that enveloped Jones.

"It's just a better opportunity for me personally to be on a team I believe is really going forward," Cobb says in his explaining his decision.

Not only were the Bucs losing, but Cobb was a marked man in their offense. Every time he broke the huddle, it seemed, he faced an eight-man front designed to stop him. You don't think that gets old, butting your head against a brick wall play after play?

"I rushed for almost 1,200 yards in Tampa (in 1992) and really only (receiver) Lawrence Dawsey had a good year," Cobb says. "That was about it on offense."

That's why Cobb is so excited to be in an offense that features so many other potent weapons.

"To be on a team surrounded with such great athletes is a great opportunity," he says.

Wolf has absolutely no doubts that if Cobb stays healthy, he will rush for 1,000 years this season. No Packers running back has done that in 16 years.

"That's a very startling statistic," Wolf says. "I'm hoping we can put that to rest. You would think, particularly with this team, that you'd have to run the football. The weather here more or less dictates it.

"(Cobb) has an innate skill and ability to run with the football. That should get him a grand."

Cobb knows how long it has been since the Packers have had a 1,000-yard rusher. It's similar to the situation he faced with Tampa Bay.

"It's a challenge," he says of going where only four Packers backs have ever gone. "When I was at Tampa, I was the first (1,000-yard-rusher) there in seven years. I might be a trivia question by the time I leave here."

But there certainly would be nothing trivial about Cobb rushing for 1,000 yards this season. Although the offense is not geared around a 1,000-yard runner, it would certainly enhance Coach Mike Holmgren's ability as a play-caller and also take a load off the shoulders of quarterback Brett Favre, among other things.

"If we had a 1,000-yard back it would mean two things," Holmgren says. "One, the guy was probably healthy all year, which would make us better. Two, our offense is probably better."

Cobb knows no matter what the offense, 1,000 yards is the standard for measuring backs in the NFL.

"It's pretty important," he says. "The biggest thing is to win. You don't want to get out of focus. If that's what it takes for us to win, that's it. That's what you're measured by in this league. When you rush for 1,000 yards, it puts you up in the elite. There's only going to be six or seven guys a year out of 28 teams. That's the measuring stick."

Ultimately, however, the decisions Jones and Cobb made to come here will be measured another way, by how deep the Packers can go into the playoffs.

"I want to put myself in a situation where I was with a team that had great players and we had a chance to win the whole thing," says Jones, who may as well have been speaking for Cobb, too. "That's what this is all about. If I didn't feel deep in my heart this team could win this thing during the length of this contract, maybe (win it) all three years, then I wouldn't be here."

THE NEW DOCTOR OF 'D'

by Tom Silverstein
The Milwaukee Sentinel

Fritz Shurmur laughed when he was asked whether he would be able to withstand the brutal cold of Green Bay winters.

"Shoot, I went ice fishing on my honeymoon," said the affable 61-year -old coaching veteran who was named Packer defensive coordinator on Jan. 31. The question was in reference to Shurmur's predecessor, Ray Rhodes, who admitted the chilly weather was one of the reasons he and his family decided to return to their former California residence.

Despite the fact he has spent the last 12 years on the West Coast with the Los Angeles Rams (1982-1990) and Phoenix Cardinals (1991-1993), Shurmur is no stranger to bitter cold winters. He was raised in Wyandotte, MI, and coached defense for Albion (MI) College, the University of Wyoming, Detroit Lions and New England Patriots before winding up in the land of the sun.

If anything Shurmur is flexible. You have to be to last 40 years in this business.

But for Shurmur, flexibility isn't just a tidy word of association. It's a way of life.

All one has to do is listen to him recite the litany of defenses he has employed over the years to understand that this is not a man set in his ways.

At Wyoming, he helped develop an all-out blitzing defense designed to attack the budding pro-style pass offenses of the 1960s. In Detroit, he took over a 4-3 scheme and stuck with it. At New England, he inherited a 3-4 unit and stayed with that.

And then came his stint with the Rams. It was during his years in Los Angeles in the early and mid-80s that Shurmur became a household word around the NFL. Never a slave to any one scheme, Shurmur used both the 3-4 and 4-3 in Los Angeles as well as some not-so traditional alignments.

It was this flexibility, along with Shurmur's long track record, that made him the perfect candidate for the Packer defensive coordinator's position. Among the coaches to be let go when Phoenix fired head man Joe Bugel, Shurmur was contemplating several offers when the Packers called.

But Shurmur knew Mike Holmgren from battles with the San Francisco 49ers. He had coached with Gil Haskell in Los Angeles and Tom Lovat in Phoenix; Nolan Cromwell was one of his prize students with the Rams. It was too good of an opportunity to pass up.

"I'm tickled to death," Shurmur said of landing in Green Bay. "As soon as that option became available to me, that was my No.1 choice. I'm just absolutely thrilled to be there for a lot of reasons."

The second question Shurmur was asked when he joined the Packers—the first was about the cold—was whether he would be changing the scheme. The Packers ranked No. 2 in the NFL last year under Rhodes' direction and change didn't seem in order.

"There have been a lot of changes in football and he's lived through those changes."

At first, Shurmur assured people that he would run as much of Rhodes' system as possible, with the exception of a few of his own wrinkles. Then, the Packers signed pass rushing defensive end Sean Jones; inside linebacker Johnny Holland retired because of a neck injury; and former Chicago Bear defensive tackle Steve McMichael was signed.

Suddenly, Shurmur was left with a dearth of linebackers and an abundance of good defensive linemen. The decision to switch from a 3-4 defense to a 4-3 had been talked about when Jones was signed, but became more of a reality when Holland retired. And so it was, Mr. Flexibility, went back to the drawing board.

"Fritz definitely has experienced a lot of ways to do things," Lovat said. "To get it done now you have to adjust yourself to your personnel. It's not my way or the highway with Fritz.

"He's got a certain philosophy of defense. It's sound, very sound. There have been a lot of changes in football and he's lived through those changes. The way you discipline players is different than it was 15 years ago. Fritz has made those adjustments."

Simpy put, Shurmur's philosophy is to be aggressive. Pressure the quarterback and you affect the entire offense. It doesn't matter what formation or wrinkle he adds, the primary goal in Shurmur's defense is to create pressure and swarm the football.

In Los Angeles, Shurmur arrived at the end of the Fred Dryer-Jack Youngblood-Larry Brooks era and was left with more linebackers than defensive linemen. He switched to a 3-4 base defense and sometimes played with one or two linemen and five linebackers.

Statistically, the Rams were never No. 1 in defense under Shurmur, but they led the NFL in sacks in 1988. Mostly, the Rams were a bend-but-don't-break defense that could be counted on in the clutch. Six times the Rams made it to the playoffs during Shurmur's reign, reaching the NFC championship game in 1985 and 1989.

"We always try to do whatever it takes to shake up the offense, if it's lining up in something they've never seen then you do that," Shurmur said. "We've got to be able to come up with ways to put us in the best position to win next year.

"I think where it all starts is upfront. If you can dominate on the line of scrimmage it allows you to do a lot of things. The best defensive teams have had dominating front guys. There's a lot of pressure on them. They've got to be dominating forces."

At the same time the linemen must endure high expectations they are also granted greater freedom under Shurmur's plan. Shurmur expects big plays out of his linemen and so he often "turns them free", or allows them to concentrate on rushing the passer.

That's great news for players like Reggie White, Bryce Paup, Jones and McMichael. Giving a defensive lineman freedom to rush quarterbacks is like eliminating the speed limit on the highway.

"I think he's fine tuning right now," linebacker Bryce Paup said. "It seems to me he knows what he wants to do. He's a stickler on technique."

Shurmur won't abandon his "big nickel" defense that he employed in Phoenix in recent years. The big nickel consists of four down linemen, two linebackers and five defensive backs, two of whom are strong safeties.

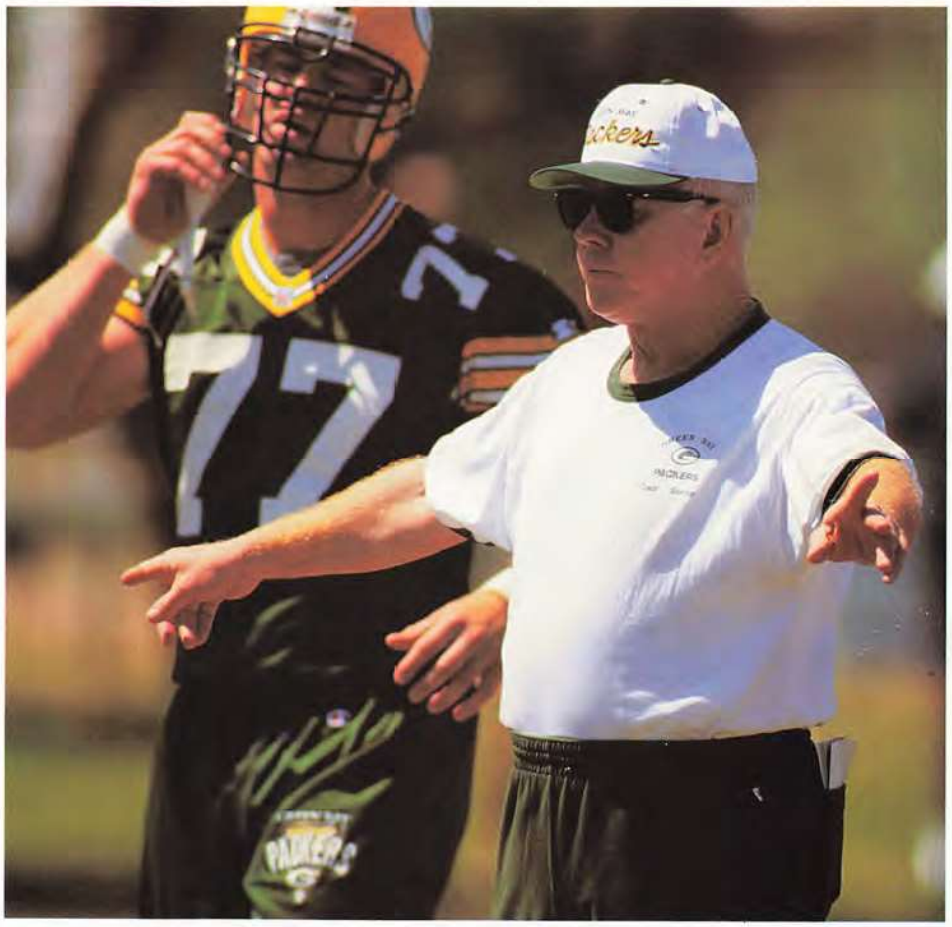
It's a defense Shurmur developed while with the Rams and perfected with the Cardinals. Low on quality linebackers, Shurmur went to the scheme in order to take advantage of pass rushers like Freddie Joe Nunn, Eric Swann and Ken Harvey.

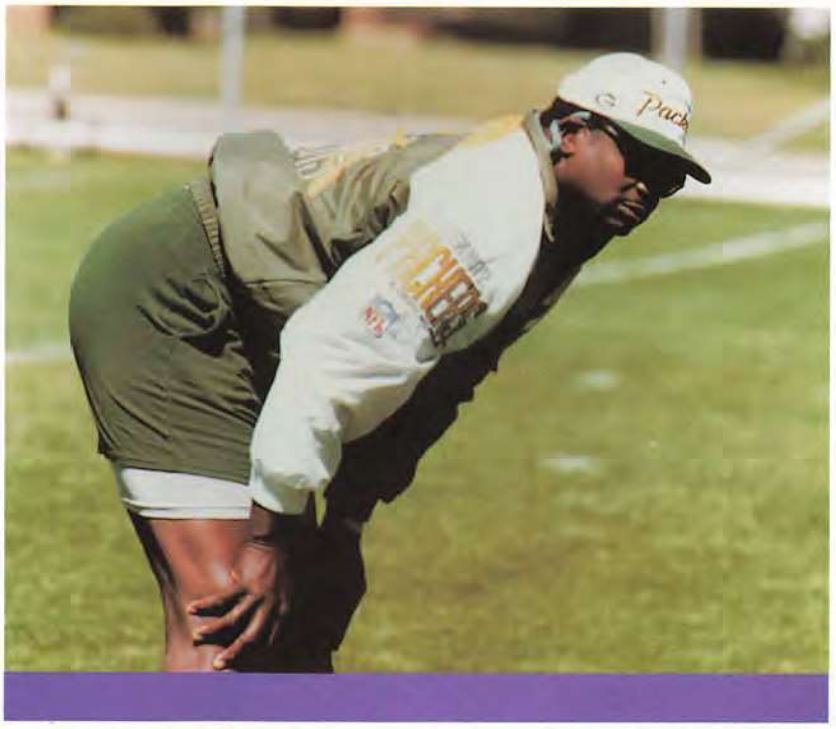
The Cardinals didn't play the defense on just passing downs either. They used it in all kinds of situations, allowing Shurmur more flexibility in his schemes. When Shurmur took over in 1991, the Cardinals were 23rd in points allowed. When he left after last season, they were 7th, the club's best finish since 1978 when the NFL went to a 16-game schedule.

"I don't worry too much about statistics," Shurmur said. "I'm worried about keeping them out of the end zone. That's No. 1 for me."

Unquestionably, Holmgren has to feel comfortable replacing the bright and talented Rhodes with someone as experienced as Shurmur. The Packer defense will look different in 1994, but that should be more of a concern for Packer opponents than Holmgren.

Fritz Shurmur, the Packers' new defensive coordinator, makes a pertinent point to defensive end Matt Eller during a mini-camp practice.

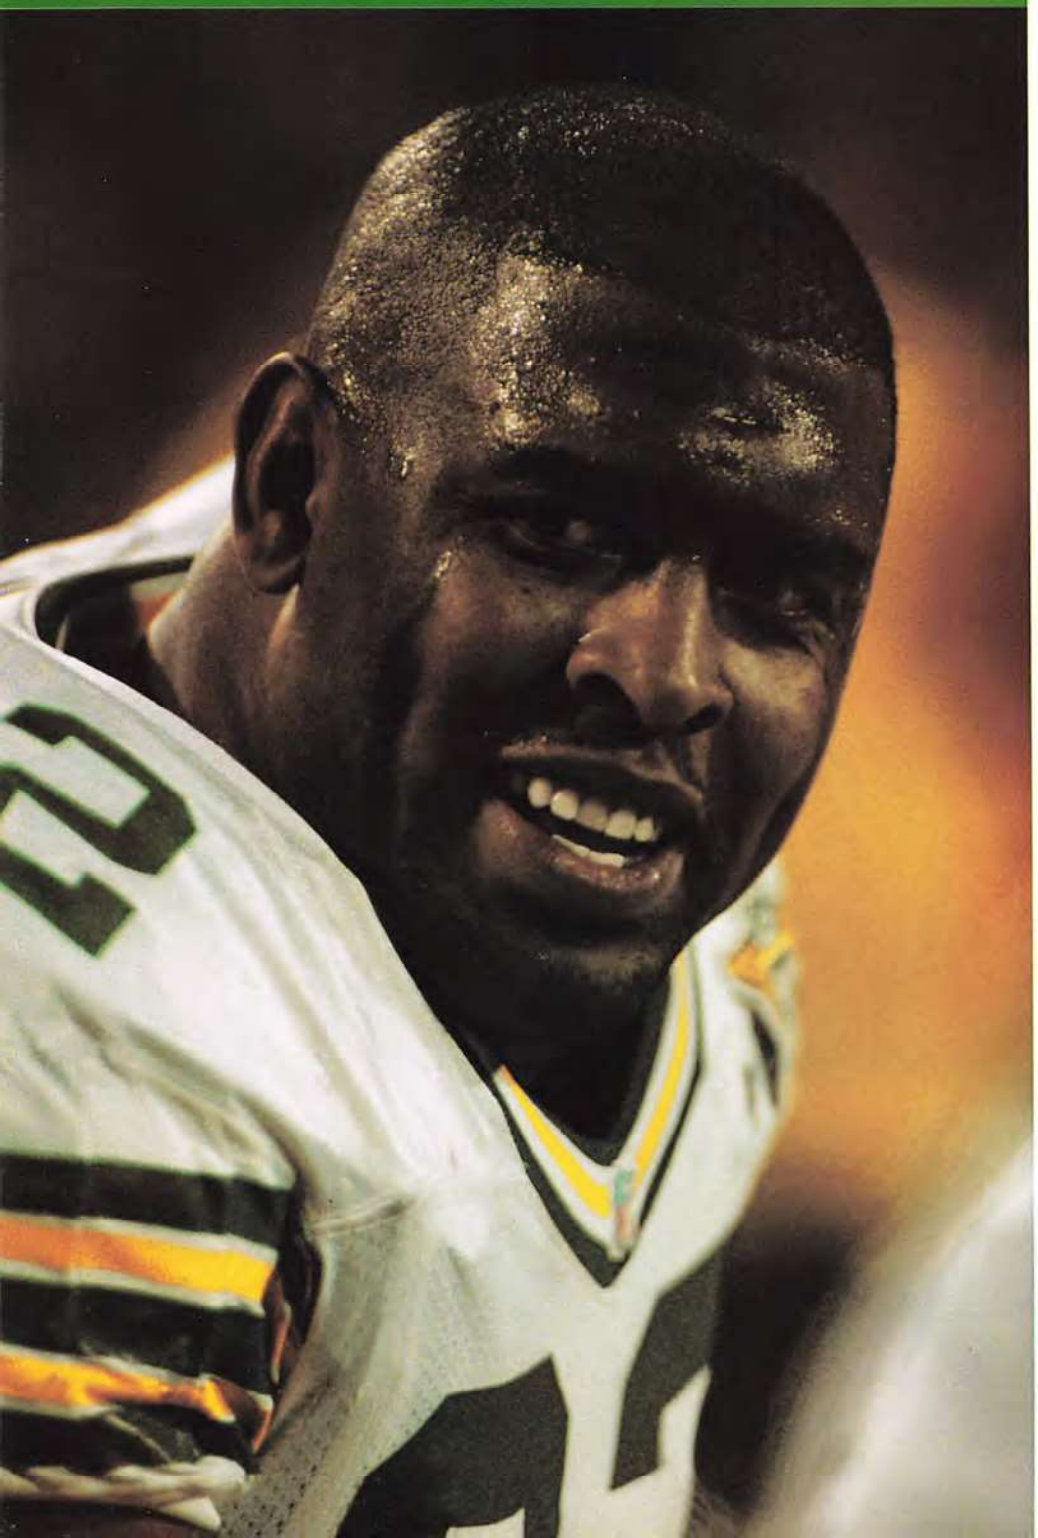




Larry Brooks, the ex-Los Angeles Rams Pro Bowler who coaches the Packers' defensive line, bends low to get a better line on the practice field proceedings.

REGGIE:

HE'S TOO GOOD TO BE TRUE



By Gary D'Amato
Milwaukee Journal

In this era of style over substance, hype over humility and self-promotion over self-restraint, Reggie White is almost too good to be true.

He is a multimillionaire who gives freely of his money. He is a man with intense pride who refuses to coast on his considerable reputation. He is a relentless competitor who gives his all on every down. He is an ordained Baptist minister who cannot stomach injustice.

White, the Green Bay Packers' defensive left end, is all of these things,

And much, much more.

On the field and off it, in the locker room and in the community, he is a leader in word and deed.

When White signed a four-year, $17 million free-agent contract with Green Bay last year, there were whispers that the Packers had over bid for the services of a 3l-year-old player on the downside of a fabulous career.

"There are a lot of things that I really have to prove," White said before training camp started. "Everybody is saying that I'm getting old and that I've lost a step and things like that. So there's a lot that I have to prove to myself. It has been a motivating factor."

Opposing offensive tackles were greatly distressed by those words. To them, a motivated Reggie White was a nightmarish thought, indeed.

White, adjusting to a new defense and new players around him, got off to a slow start, and Green Bay won just one of its first four games.

Then came the night of Oct. 10 and a pivotal game against Denver in Green Bay. Broncos quarterback John Elway had brought his team back from a 30-7 halftime deficit to within 30-27 late in the game.

Denver cornerback Le-Lo Lang's interception at the Packers' 43-yard line with 2 minutes, 5 seconds left deflated the Lambeau Field crowd. With Elway performing his typical fourth-quarter magic, it appeared the Packers were headed for a crushing defeat.

White simply would not allow that to happen. He sacked Elway on back-to-back plays, single-handedly killing Denver's momentum and saving not only the game, but perhaps the Packers' season.

Instead of being l-4, the Packers were 2-3 and on their way to a 9-7 record and their first playoff appearance in a non-strike season since 1972.

"It was very satisfying," the self-effacing White said of his sacks. "Praise God."

A WINNING SMILE: Reggie, still perspiring in the wake of a demanding day at "the office," displays the joy of victory following the Packers' 28-24 playoff win over the Detroit Lions.

There would be other awe-inspiring performances by Green Bay's Minister of Defense. On Nov. 14, for example, White came up with two sacks, three quarterback knockdowns, six solo tackles and two assists and a fumble recovery in a 19-17 victory over the New Orleans Saints.

"But he's like that every week," said Packers defensive tackle David Grant. "On the tapes we watch of him, I've never seen stuff done like that before. Reggie is the best defensive lineman to ever put on a uniform."

"He's by far the best defensive player in the game."

Late in the season, a month shy of his 32nd birthday, White said he was playing some of the best football of his career.

"I think I'm playing better than I played the year I had 21 sacks (in 1987, with Philadelphia)," he said. "In no way will I ever brag about Reggie. I will be honest. I think I'm playing better than I have in a long time."

Ray Rhodes, then the Packers' defensive coordinator, agreed.

"He's by far the best defensive player in the game," Rhodes said. "People talk about Reggie having been in the league so long, but Reggie's getting better.

"I think he's playing some of his best football now. He's at the top of his game. He takes care of himself. He works hard. He enjoys practice. He's living up to everything we knew he would."

White finished the regular season with 13 sacks, tied for the National Football Conference lead with Renaldo Turnbull of New Orleans and the most by a Packers defensive lineman since Ezra Johnson had 14 1/2 in 1983.

White also finished fourth on the team with 79 tackles, forced three fumbles and batted down two passes. He was named to the All-Pro second team by The Associated Press.

Not coincidentally, Green Bay's defense finished second in total defense in the NFL, up from 23rd the previous year.

And, most important, White led the Packers into the playoffs, where they lost in the second round to the eventual Super Bowl champion Dallas Cowboys, 27-17.

In the off-season, White remained busy. As part of his outreach ministry, he and some of his representatives laid the groundwork to establish non-depository banks in Mobile, AL., Knoxville, TN., Philadelphia and West Palm Beach, FL.

The banks will be targeted at helping inner-city residents take financial control of their lives through low-interest loans.

"This is going to affect the youths big-time, because we are going to be able to give them jobs," said White, who pledged $1 million of his own money. "We'll be role models for them and allow them to see that we are concentrating on trying to influence them instead of trying to put pressure on them about changing."

Reggie White leans over a fallen John Elway after recording a game saving sack of the Denver quarterback in the final minute of a 30-27 victory over the Broncos.

White also is working on a home for teen mothers outside of Knoxville.

"In the next 15 to 20 years, what God has involved us in is going to change the face of the inner-cities all across the country," White said.

In his spare time, he helped recruit free-agent defensive end Sean Jones of the Houston Oilers. Jones, who has 88 1/2 career sacks, signed with the Packers and is slated to start at right end, opposite White, in the 4-3 defensive alignment that new defensive coordinator Fritz Shurmur plans to install.

"We have two Pro Bowl-type players on each side," Shurmur said. "It's an exciting thought to have both of those players on the field at the same time."

With hard-nosed John Jurkovic and another free agent, ex-Chicago Bear star Steve McMichael, the likely starters at the tackles, opposing offenses won't be able to double-team White as often as they did in 1993.

"It's going to relieve some pressure," White said.

White will not be satisfied until he leads the Packers to a Super Bowl, the one goal that has eluded him in his Hall of Fame career. But, win or lose, he is at peace with his decision to come to Green Bay.

"There are only three things in Green Bay," he said, explaining his happiness. "God, family and the Packers."

Didn't Vince Lombardi once say something very similar?

Great minds think alike.

THE PLAYOFFS:

A MICROCOSM OF PACK'S '93 SEASON

by Michael Bauman
The Milwaukee Journal

For the Green Bay Packers, the playoffs at the end of the 1993 season were exciting, mercurial, dramatic, improbable. In other words, it was another day at the office for the Pack.

The playoffs represented a fitting conclusion to a roller coaster ride of a regular season that had ups and downs, highs and lows, but ultimately illustrated tangible signs of improvement and legitimate hope for the future.

In the playoffs, the Packers defeated the Detroit Lions in the Silverdome, 28-24, and then lost to the once and future Super Bowl champion Dallas Cowboys, 27-17, in Texas Stadium. But the mere recitation of those results does not begin to tell the story.

The Detroit game featured two moments that will find a lasting place in the rich lore of the Green Bay franchise. In these moments plays were made that could only be made by a handful of players. The fact that these players were wearing the green and gold spoke of improvement made in the recent past and of promise for the future.

The Packers came to Pontiac, MI, on January 8, attempting to rebound from a 30-20 loss to Detroit in the previous week in this same building. That loss had cost them the Central Division championship and the home-field advantage. It had been a disheartening performance, but what happened on this Saturday served to erase that painful memory.

Trailing, 24-21, with 2 minutes, 26 seconds remaining in the game, quarterback Brett Favre moved the Packers from their own 29 to the Detroit 40. Favre then dropped back to pass, but was pressured and was forced to scamper to his left. He was looking for tight end Ed West.

But on the other side of the field, wide receiver Sterling Sharpe had gotten behind the Detroit secondary. The Lions had rolled up their cornerbacks to prevent a short pass. Safety William White later accepted the blame for not being in the deep section of the field where Sharpe found himself open.

Still, there are not many quarterbacks in the National Football League who could have delivered the ball to Sharpe, no matter how open he was. Favre was well to the left side of the field. Sharpe was in the right side of the end zone. Favre had to throw the ball down the field and across the field, at least 65 yards in the air. But he did. It was a strike. It was a touchdown. With 55 seconds left, it was a Green Bay victory.

"It was the play of the year," Coach Mike Holmgren said. "It's just a wonderful, wonderful feeling. We worked so hard to get this one."

"I don't want to say a hope and a prayer, but that's what it was," Favre said.

The moment was sufficiently unique that Sharpe broke his usual silence and spoke to reporters after the game. "What happened is they played a zone and their safety never got over the top," Sharpe said. "When Brett rolled to his left the defense just read his eyes and drifted to the right. Brett just heaved it and I was standing in the end zone and made the catch."

It was a gigantic play, a magnificent play that will live as long as playoff highlights films are shown. But to get to that play, the Packers had required another play of epic proportions.

Late in the third quarter, the Packers were down, 17-14, and the Lions were on the Green Bay 5, threatening to take charge of the game for keeps. The Packers were in a man-to-man coverage, but safety George Teague spotted the Lions' receivers in a close alignment and checked out of the man coverage into a zone.

Sterling Sharpe alights in the Detroit end zone with the winning touchdown in a 28-24 come-from-behind victory over the Lions in the wild card playoff at the Pontiac Silverdome January 8. It was Sharpe's third TD of the game, tying an NFL record.

"George is a rookie, but he's got presence of mind, knowing that when they're in a 'spaghetti' situation, when the receivers are in close, they're going to run crossing routes," said safety LeRoy Butler. "So check out of it and go to a zone."

What happened next was a post-season league record. Detroit quarterback Eric Kramer threw to his right into the end zone for tight end Ty Hallock. Teague, reading the play correctly all the way, beat Hallock to the ball, caught it, and then just kept on running up the left sideline. By the time he was done, it was a record 101-yard interception return for a touchdown and new life for the Packers.

"I think Kramer looked to (wide receiver) Herman Moore first, changed his mind, almost threw it sideways," Teague said. "I was right there. When I saw him throw it I was standing right behind Hallock. When I saw Kramer throw it, I just ran in front of him. I think I kind of ran through his arm and got the ball.

"Then I didn't see nothing but one of my guys and their quarterback. When I got past their quarterback all I saw was the fans in the end zone. I just tried to get there as fast as I could.

"To be honest," Teague said, "I was thinking whether somebody was going to catch me or not because I didn't feel like I was moving that fast. I don't know if I was or not. That wasn't the hard part. Afterward, I felt like about 18,000 people hit me on the head. Huggin' me, kissin' me. I got tired from all that instead of from the running."

Robert Brooks, who captured NFL kickoff return honors during the regular season, is off and running on his specialty in the Packers' divisional playoff game against the Cowboys at Texas Stadium.

This was a vivid reminder that the Packers had drafted Teague in the first round because he was considered the classic "big-play" guy. In the 1993 Sugar Bowl he had intercepted two passes, returning one of them for a touchdown and chased down wide receiver Lamar Thomas from behind, stripping him of the ball, in the process leading Alabama to a victory over Miami and the national championship.

As big as those plays were, when asked where this one ranked, Teague responded: "I think it's better than any of them." No one in Wisconsin, or Michigan for that matter, would argue the point. This couldn't have been a bigger play. The size of the playing field wouldn't allow it.

As it turned out, Teague's play made possible the later heroics of Favre and Sharpe. Two plays of this magnitude hardly seemed possible within the confines of one game. But they were possible and they carried the Packers to victory.

Eight days later, the Green Bay season ended, and not happily, in Texas. The Packers lost to the Cowboys, but the 27-17 defeat had to be put in perspective.

The Cowboys, after all, were merely the best team in football. And they had manhandled the Packers, 36-14, on Oct. 3. On this day, the Packers were beaten, but hardly embarrassed. Pro-Packer wagerers also could have told you that whatever else occurred, Green Bay had beaten the 14-point spread. Progress had been made and noted.

"We weren't in awe of the Cowboys," Holmgren said. "We went toe-to-toe. It's just tough. They have great players. My feeling was that we battled them. That's encouraging to me."

1994 PLAYOFFS

"'We're going to be there (the playoffs) from here on,' that's the first thing Mike said," Butler reported. "'Don't even worry about it, we'll be there next year.' I don't think anybody should be disappointed. Our expectations were to go as far as we could and we went as far as we could. I said earlier that if we don't beat these guys, this season's not a success. But I have to change my mind a little, because I saw the little fire at the end that will hold me over for next season. Something to feel hungry about next season."

The message of this game was that, no, the Packers were not yet ready to compete on equal footing with Dallas, but yes, they were getting closer.

Combined with those incomparable, heart-stopping plays in the victory over Detroit, the Packers 1993 post-season offered a message. This was a team that had not yet reached its peak, but it was close enough so that at any moment it could stun the opposition, the fans and football in general. The Packers were still a work in progress. but they were definitely in progress.

Jurkovic, here attempting to forge past the Raiders' Dan Turk, came off the practice squad and beat out a second round draft choice to become the Packers' starting nose tackle in 1992.

'JURKO'
HAS OWN APPROACH TO QBs: VIOLENT AND DETERMINED

by Dale Hofmann
Milwaukee Sentinel

John Jurkovic figures he has acquired his approach to life from his father when he was growing up in the brown bag suburb of Calumet City, IL. His approach to quarterbacks, on the other hand, is all his own.

Fortunately for the general population, the former is kinder and gentler than the latter. One is peaceful and fun loving, the other violent and determined. But both provide a measure of the player Packer fans are just now beginning to discover. The man General Manager Ron Wolf called "one of the biggest surprises" of Green Bay's basically amazing 1993 season.

Wolf wasn't the only observer who didn't know quite what to expect from the Packers' popular defensive lineman until last season. A fan favorite and a media magnet after three years in the league, Jurkovic was still an unproven commodity on the field.

Now there's no more mystery. Now he's merely one of the most effective nose tackles in all of football, whether everyone has figured it out or not.

Undersized, underappreciated and undrafted, Jurkovic was best known as a TV talk show host, a hockey play-by-play commentator and an all-around character. Self-effacing to a fault, he gained notoriety but no fame for surrendering his No. 92 to the newly arrived Reggie White. White was a Hall of Famer in waiting, while Jurkovic was a project, progressing slowly from practice player to backup to stopgap starter.

But all of that changed last season when he won a first string job that was supposed to be someone else's. And now the Packers would like to think he's well on his way to a distinguished career and maybe to a Pro Bowl before long.

If it happens, it won't be a surprise anymore, but it won't be magic either. It will be fun, because Jurkovic thinks life should be fun. But mainly it will the the result of plain hard work, because that's the way he was brought up.

"I remember vacations when I was a kid," said Jurkovic. "Other people wanted to go to Europe or Florida when they went on vacation. Not my father. He just wanted to work in the garden.

"He would get up at 7 o'clock on every morning of his vacation and go right out to that garden. He'd be crouching down there hour after hour with an Old Style at his elbow, weeding it inch by inch.

"And when it got dark, he'd come into the house. Happy and well."

Happy and well. Down and dirty. Maybe it's genetic.

There's no better way to describe how John Jurkovic goes at his life and at his job in the glamorless world of NFL nose tackles.

There might be one difference, though. If it had been the son weeding that garden, he'd want to do it better and faster than anybody else on the block. Especially if someone said he couldn't.

"I'm a happy guy," Jurkovic said. "When I'm playing hoops or softball, I just have a good time. We have a basketball team in the off-season and my game goes from one 3-point line to the other. There's not a lot of defense, and there's none of that slam dunking. I can't touch the bottom of the net.

"But that's charity stuff. When somebody challenges me, that's different. I'm a South Side guy, a jack-of-all-trades. And when you challenge me, one way or another, I'm going to get it done. Even if I've never done it before. Even if I have to hire somebody, I'm going to get it done.

"I pride myself on reacting to pressure situations. Put the money on the table and get the cameras rolling. Anybody can do it when there's nothing at stake. It's the guy who can make the shot, sink the putt or get to the quarterback when you're not supposed to get to the quarterback...he's the money guy."

Getting to the quarterback is a crusade for most defensive linemen, and Jurkovic is no different. Except that he's a nose tackle, and nose tackles have a bumpier, more crowded route back there than anyone else. Many times, Jurkovic wasn't on the road at all, because he was getting pulled for a pass rushing specialist on third-and-long situations.

That changed toward the end of last season, though, and the change showed up in Jurkovic's statistics as he recorded all 5 1/2 of his sacks in the last six starts. He got 2 1/2 of those in the LA Raider game alone, which was one-half more than he'd had in 12 starts the previous season.

GAME FACE: Highly congenial off the field, nose tackle John Jurkovic is an intense, fully focused competitor on game day, as evidenced above.

It's a change he's dedicated to making permanent.

"When you're in there on third-and-long, you're pretty sure they have to pass, and that's when the sacks go up," Jurkovic said. "I hope to be in a lot more of them. I pattern myself after a guy like Steve McMichael, who got maybe 10 or 12 sacks a year.

"Not with any fancy stuff and not with the first move. But with the second and third move.

"This is not a glamour position. Most people couldn't name three nose tackles in the whole league. You can't get by on your good looks. Every play is a three- or four-second war. And then you get up, find out what the hell happened and go to war again."

Jurkovic has been going to war for the better part of 15 years starting with a standout high school career at Thornton Fractional North in suburban Chicago. But the battles have been pretty lonely.

A three time all-conference, one time all-state player in high school, he was passed over by the bigger colleges and signed by Eastern Illinois. Twice the conference defensive player of the year and a Division I-AA All-American, he wasn't drafted at all by the NFL.

The Miami Dolphins signed him as a free agent and buried him on their practice squad. The Packers picked him up in 1991, cut him and re-signed him for their practice squad. It wasn't until his third year in the league that he got a real crack at serious playing time, and he responded by beating out the incumbent Esera Tuaolo for the starting job.

The Packers must not have been impressed. They went out and signed free agent Bill Maas for a pile of money and handed him Jurkovic's job. Jurkovic remembers the moment well.

"I was sitting in the barber's chair reading the paper, and there it was," he said. "It said the Packers had signed Maas and given him the starting job. That blew me right out of the water."

When Jurkovic splashed down, it sent ripples throughout the Packer defense. Maas had trouble with an Achilles tendon injury, and Jurkovic took over. By the time Maas came back, there was no longer a vacancy at nose tackle.

Suddenly everyone was beginning to discover that a very good football player had been hidden under the wisecracks, the TV gigs and the great interviews. Fun loving John Jurkovic, the 6-2 kid with the small college background, could play.

Or as his 1993 line coach, Greg Blache, put it: "He has achieved more than most people achieve with far better skills. He's a remarkable individual. He's a tough customer, and he's loyal and committed. He's one of those few good men."

Jurkovic appreciates the compliment, but he also understands that it took more than just the opportunity to get his career on track. It took a new commitment on his part.

"I wasn't too famous for what I did on the field, was I?" he said. "But what I was doing there wasn't much to brag about.

"Last year was kind of a make or break season for me. I went in about 15 pounds lighter at 277, and it was a great weight for me. I'd always been able to make tackles, but the speed and endurance weren't there.

"The game that really woke me up was New Orleans when I had six tackles. I didn't have any sacks, but I was in the quarterback's face all day. After that, things just got better and better."

With a new contract and a grip on the No. 1 spot on the depth chart at nose tackle, Jurkovic has never had things going so well entering a season. But he takes absolutely none of it for granted.

He points out that there's a new line coach and a new defensive coordinator for him to impress and a lot of unfinished business for the Packers to transact. "We need to take a much bigger step than we did last year," he said.

Jurkovic took a pretty hefty one himself in the off-season when he bought a house near Green Bay after spending all of his previous winters back in Calumet City. The time seemed right for real estate.

"This is the first year I've felt a little bit secure here," he said "I had no reason to put down roots before. But I like Green Bay, and I think I made a statement here."

He belongs, period. As for the house, you wouldn't want to be a weed in John Jurkovic's garden.

RUETTGERS: A MODEL...ON FIELD AND OFF

by Kent Youngblood
Wisconsin State Journal

A widespread Ken Ruettgers, here fending off Detroit linebacker Dennis Gibson, allowed only four sacks while facing nine Pro Bowl rushers over a challenging 16-game schedule in 1993.

Ken Ruettgers is a model of free-thinking in an NFL world where conformity is the rule and reputations too often come pre-packaged.

Ask him about the game he plays and he'll talk about the joy of football—then discuss its business side with the detachment of an accountant.

"There is a time and a place for each," says Ruettgers, a Southern California graduate with an MBA from Cal State-Bakersfield who has become a model of consistency at left tackle.

Ask him about the fickle nature of fame that comes with a nine-year NFL career and he'll answer with knowledge gleaned from being on both sides.

"People love you not for who you are, but for what you are," says Ruettgers.

Ruettgers knows who he is: On the field, where he has clearly emerged as a leader on the Green Bay Packers' offensive line. And off the field, where he has always used his position to be a role model—both in Green Bay and his hometown of Bakersfield.

But lately he has begun to rethink the role of role models and has begun work on a book about the subject. His ideas are as compelling as a crunching drive block.

It began soon after National Basketball Association star Charles Barkley came out with his famous "I am not a role model" comment.

"I had people coming up to me all the time saying, 'What do you think about what Charles Barkley said,'" Ruettgers says. "I'd always grown up in the sport with people saying you're a role model. I never really questioned it. I kind of always accepted it."

And acted on it with countless hours of his donated time. Since then he has re-examined it.

Ruettgers realizes that—for better or worse—athletes will always be saddled with the responsibility. "It's not our decision," he says. "Our actions will speak for us. I recognize that. So I have a decision in my life: to be a positive influence or a negative influence."

So Ruettgers will continue to donate his time as he's always done. But to his way of thinking everyone is a role model, with primary responsibility coming first at home, then on the job.

Without question Ruettgers is a role model on the field.

Ruettgers took his play to a new level last season, his ninth in the NFL. He returned from a holdout to play nearly every offensive down in every game. And he went against the best: Ruettgers faced 1993 Pro Bowl pass rushers in nine of the Packers' 16 regular-season games. He allowed just four sacks.

"Kenny's the kind of player who improves every year...he works hard at his trade."

"I'd say it was one of my best," Ruettgers says of last season.

To be sure, Ruettgers has benefited from the offensive system coach Mike Holmgren brought with him to the team, one that uses shorter drops by the quarterback. But his success has more to do with his work ethic than any offensive system.

"Kenny's the kind of player who improves every year," Tom Lovat, the Packers' offensive line coach, says of Ruettgers. "He works hard at his trade."

A player who relies heavily on technique, Ruettgers is a remarkably focused player. He has put in long hours in the weight room building his 6-foot-6, 290-pound frame. He keeps a book on each defensive end or outside linebacker he faces during a season and spends every off day during the season studying film.

Lovat, for one, wishes all the players had those kind of work habits. "Kenny has come to the forefront," Lovat says. "He's the guy out in front now, showing that leadership."

He learned those work habits from his role model: His father, Ron.

"When I was eight years old my mom died," he says. "(My father) took care of ma's illness and I had a younger brother who was six and another who was one. He took care of all of us. And now that I have three kids of my own I can better understand the sacrifice and commitment and his responsibility and his faith. Those were attributes that I think are important. I think it's very difficult to see those kinds of things in 60 minutes of football."

And that is Ruettgers' point: Yes, athletes will always be asked to be role models. But they have a limited scope.

"It's hard to influence a life on your way out of the locker room with a 10-second stop to sign an autograph," he says. "I think you can do a lot more negative than you can positive as a professional athlete. I know a lot of guys around different sports who don't like the term 'role model' because it puts more responsibility than they already have on their shoulders.

"I don't think people know me off the field. That's why it's important for all of us to realize that our first responsibility is to our families...the people who are out looking for role models need to know that their primary responsibility is to their family—modeling is the No. 1 way children learn. And who is their model, day in and day out?"

To Ruettgers, it's the parents. And too often, parents don't do enough.

"Too often as parents, we want to hand over the keys to our car to somebody else and let them drive it," he says. "We want role models to take care of our children."

So Ruettgers' primary job is to care for his family: Wife Sheryl, son Matthew (six) and daughters Katherine (four) and Susan (two). Recently he made the decision to stay in Green Bay year-round—for the first time in his career—so his son wouldn't have to change schools.

"My children need to have some roots somewhere," he says. "They needed to have a home base. I did miss the weather, though."

Of course, back-to-back 9-7 seasons by the Packers—and his first taste of the NFL playoffs last year—helped Ruettgers get through a cold winter.

Now, Ruettgers can hardly wait for the 1994 season. "Our scouting department, our general manager and our coaches are putting together a very talented team," he says. "We're going into training camp trying hard to improve on last year. And I think we were very close last year."

It was not always this way. After two injury-plagued seasons—he missed 17 starts during the 1990 and '91 seasons—Ruettgers contemplated leaving the game and a team that had recorded yet another losing season.

"I absolutely didn't want to play here," he says. "Absolutely. And I wasn't sure I wanted to play at all."

Holmgren and general manager Ron Wolf convinced him to stay. Since then Ruettgers has become the cornerstone of the Packers offensive line.

"The coaches and the players on this team are the reason I'm continuing to play," he says.

As long as he does, he'll continue to be in the spotlight, continue to struggle with the opportunity—and the burden—that being called a role model carries.

"Reggie White and I were sitting on the floor at a Phoenix Suns game," Ruettgers recalled. "Watching the Suns play the (Golden State) Warriors in a playoff game. Some gal behind us goes, 'I love you Charles Barkley!' And I thought, wow, this gal obviously doesn't even know him. It made me think about what Michael Jordan said: 'Who would I be if I never picked up a basketball?'"

EDGAR BENNETT: A 1,000-YARD BACK

by Pete Dougherty
Green Bay Press-Gazette

The Green Bay Packers still have not had a 1,000-yard rusher since Terdell Middleton in 1978. But last year they had a 1,000-yard gainer in the backfield.

Edgar Bennett quietly became the Packers' most productive running back last season, gaining 1,007 yards rushing and receiving.

He might never be the Packers' marquee back, but for total yardage last season he was topped only by Brett Favre (3,519 yards passing and rushing) and Sterling Sharpe (1,282 yards receiving and rushing) on a team that advanced to the second round of the playoffs.

He also scored 10 touchdowns, which was one fewer than Sharpe for the lead.

"That was my forte at Florida State. I was going to give you running and receiving, and most of all, touchdowns," Bennett said.

This came in Bennett's first year back at fullback, the position he played for four years at Florida State. The Packers played him at halfback as a rookie, and he gained 214 yards there in limited playing time, including a 107-yard game against the Chicago Bears.

But in the offseason, the Packers acquired John Stephens, and with him and Darrell Thompson available for halfback, they moved Bennett back to fullback. It's there he is going to stay. In the offseason this year, they signed Reggie Cobb as an unrestricted free agent and drafted LeShon Johnson, the leading rusher in NCAA Division I football last year and a highly rated prospect, in the third round.

In the Packers' offense, those are the guys who are going to run the ball. The fullback is going to block, get an occasional handoff and catch plenty of passes. Bennett said he would prefer being the marquee runner, but a guy's got to understand his role.

"At tailback, sometimes you don't get a chance to do everything," he said. "You know you're not going to catch the ball as much because you're running it 20, 25 times a game. At fullback you know you're going to catch 50, 60 passes in a season and score a lot of touchdowns and get a chance to run. I only hope I'll get a chance to break some (long runs), because there won't be too many (carries) next year."

That is a familiar refrain in Bennett's career. At Lee High School in Jacksonville, FL, he rushed for 1,300 yards as a senior and was first-team all-state. But when he got to Florida State, there was a long line of talented tailbacks, including Dexter Carter, Sammie Smith and Amp Lee, all of whom went on to become first- or second-round draft picks in the NFL.

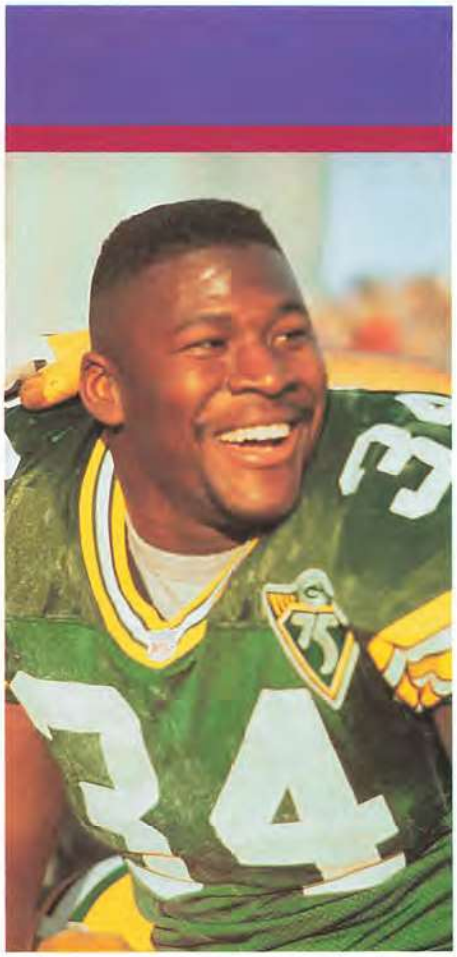
So as a freshman, coach Bobby Bowden told him he could move to fullback and have a great shot at starting immediately, or he could stay at tailback and maybe never be the top guy.

He wanted to play, so he switched to fullback. He gained almost as many yards receiving (1,095) as he did rushing (1,246) in his career there as a four-year starter.

"All I would do is block and catch passes," he said. "I just wanted to play."

Though his high school's offense didn't prepare its go-to rusher well for that job, "We never threw the ball," he said he still got to Florida State able to catch the ball.

He was a two-year letter winner in basketball, a sport in which all the players on the court have to be able to catch the ball. And after football practice in high school, his coach would work alone with him, throwing to him even though the team passed rarely in games.



A MOST HAPPY FELLA: A hardnosed competitor on the field, Edgar Bennett is one of the sunniest citizens when not engaged in "combat." He is seldom without a smile, the broad kind displayed above.

"He said that just because we don't throw the ball in high school, there's going to come a time in college or at the pro level where I'm going to have to catch the ball," Bennett said. "I think he did a good job."

He was a blocking back for those prolific rushers at Florida State, but one of the questions coming to the pros was whether he was big enough to take on the NFL's defensive linemen.

As a tailback his rookie year, Bennett, who is 6-feet, played at about 214 pounds. Last year he was about 220, which still is on the light side for NFL fullbacks. But Bennett, who is going into his third year in the pros, has entrenched himself at the position.

"I'm a back who can run, I can run on grass, I can run on turf, I can run in the cold, I can run in the heat."

"Blocking is something you have to do to play in this league at running back," he said. "Blocking is all willpower. You've got to want to block, you've got to want to knock that guy on the ground."

His specialty is cut blocking, a technique where he makes eye contact with the man he intends to block, and just when he gets to him, drops down and takes out the defender's legs. It's a move he uses often but not exclusively, lest defenders get used to it and figure ways to jump over him.

"That pretty much eliminates him period," Bennett said. "When he's on the ground, he can't make plays. Occasionally you have to hit them up high, on lead blocking and plays like that, and pass protection."

Bennett was the Packers' fourth-round draft pick in 1992, and he was the ninth running back taken in that draft overall. Among the players taken ahead of him were Lee, for whom he blocked at Florida State; Vaughn Dunbar; and Tommy Vardell.

Bennett's 1,000-yard combined season last year was tops among that group.

Plus, he's been durable. He has not missed a game because of injury his first two years, and the only time he was slowed last season was at Chicago, when a migraine near halftime took him out of the game. After getting a shot for it at intermission, he was back on the field in the second half.

"I'm a back who can run," he said. "I can run on grass, I can run on turf, I can run in the cold, I can run in the heat.

"You've got to know your role in the offense. My role is to carry the ball maybe 8 or 10 times a game, catch a few passes. As long as I touch the ball, I'm fine."

PAUP COMES INTO HIS OWN

A preying Paup zeros in from behind for a sack on Bears' quarterback Jim Harbaugh.

by Tim Froberg

Bryce Paup admits to being something of a "motorhead" who is as much at home in the grease pits as he is in the trenches of the National Football League.

And while Paup has used his mechanical tools to fix up a number of old cars, the Green Bay Packers have used Paup's physical tools in a variety of different ways to add a combustible force to their defense.

Paup has helped fuel inject the Packers' pass rush since arriving in Green Bay as an unheralded sixth-round choice from Northern Iowa in 1990. And while his ability to collar quarterbacks is exceeded only by his versatility, Green Bay's Mr. Fix-It is targeted for a more defined role in the team's defensive scheme this season.

Paup started 16 of the 18 (playoffs included) Packer games last season, but at four different positions. Paup replaced holdout Tony Bennett as a starter at the right outside linebacker "Elephant" position for nine games, then made three starts at the left outside linebacker "Buck" spot upon Bennett's return to the starting lineup. When late-season injuries decimated the inside linebacking corps, Paup was moved to the left inside linebacker's "Mike" position where he started three games. Paup even started at defensive end in the regular-season finale against Detroit.

"I made the team my rookie year as a Mike inside backer, so when I was switched there late in the season it was really just a matter of polishing up my reads," said Paup. "Still, there were a few times out there when my head was swimming and I'd get out of a bind by a running play."

"I'm not going to just be satisfied being a starter, though. I want to be a dominant player."

Despite playing more roles than a Hollywood actor, Paup set a career high in starts, quarterback sacks (12), tackles (77), passes defensed (4), and interceptions (1). Paup has never complained about the shift work, but is looking forward to settling into one position. He will enter training camp as a starting linebacker in the team's new 4-3 base defense and will be used up front as a rusher in passing situations.

It will mark the first time in Paup's four-year NFL career that he enters training camp as a full-time starter without having to worry about the contractual status of others. An opportunistic Paup capitalized on Tim Harris' holdout to see extensive action as the team's "Rover" linebacker in 1991, then last season he solidified a spot in the lineup with his rock-solid play at the Elephant in Bennett's absence.

"I almost wish someone ahead of me was holding out again," said Paup with a smile. "Hopefully, I'll be able to settle at one position. I've kind of felt like a jack-of-all-trades and a master of none. I think all the moving around might have hurt my progress as a player a little bit, but it's all about helping the team.

"I'm not going to just be satisfied being a starter, though. I want to be a dominant player. You start being comfortable with where you're at and sometimes you regress."

Paup's 1993 season was one of progress. Prior to last year, Paup had been used primarily as a situational pass rusher in nickel and dime situations. A gifted pass rusher who combines bull and speed rush techniques, Paup has registered 26 career sacks. The 6-foot-5, 250-pound Paup worked diligently last winter to shed what had been a one-dimensional role as a pass rusher. Through tae kwon do, he gained better hand speed and greater flexibility, which improved not only his pass rush, but his coverage as well.

"Last year, I really made a commitment to becoming a better football player and I wanted to prove that I deserved to be on the field more," said Paup. "The tae kwon do really helped my hand movement and my agility, and made a big difference for me on pass coverage."

The 26-year-old Paup is considerably more polished than he was in '91 when he blew onto the NFL scene like a hurricane undetected by radar. Replacing Harris as the team's designated pass rusher, Paup received national attention with an early-season sacking spree (six sacks in the first three games) and a technical knockout of Philadelphia quarterback Randall Cunningham, who was forced out for the season by a Paup hit in the '91 opener.

Paup's four sacks against Tampa Bay in Week 3 tied a Packer team record and earned him NFC Defensive Player of the Week honors. A pass-rushing star had seemingly been born. Paup, however, eventually crashed to earth in his starring role. The opposition began devising its pass-protection schemes around him and seeing frequent double teams, Paup managed just one sack the next eight games. He was sidelined the final five games with a muscle tear in his left leg.

"I've always had a good takeoff and I could use it that year because no one took me seriously," Paup said. "But I didn't have anything else. I had a few good games, then they started doubling me and I didn't have anything to counter. I was just using my strength and it took me awhile to realize that I had to have more than just one move.

"He's got an upfield burst and the ability to change directions and counter with an inside move."

"As I progressed and watched other people I added to my pass rush. I can run a person over when I have to, but basically, I try and set them up and get them off balance. I go in with a game plan of what I'm going to do against a certain guy, and I'll try and mix it up with a speed and bull rush.

"Watching Reggie White has helped, too. He's amazing. He can just rag doll 325-pound guys just through sheer athletic ability and brute force. Reggie's a master at what we call the rip-and-flip and I've learned that technique from him."

Fritz Shurmur, Green Bay's new defensive coordinator, is impressed with the talent and work ethic that Paup brings to the field.

"He's got an upfield burst and the ability to change directions and counter with an inside move," said Shurmur. "He's done that effectively inside over the guard as well as being an outside rusher. He's an outstanding player who plays hard all the time and he's so versatile. He plays just about everywhere but nose guard."

Paup's work ethic was forged through long hours of hard work in the corn and bean fields of Central Iowa. The youngest of four boys raised by Byron and Harriet Paup, Bryce grew up in the small town of Scranton (population 575), located about 100 miles northwest of Des Moines. Byron does custom farm work around Green County and Bryce and his older brothers grew up assisting their dad with his work, helping spray beans and apply fertilizer.

"My dad was my role model growing up," Bryce said. "He was a good person who worked hard and went to church every Sunday. He taught me the right way to do things. That if you just work hard and be a good person, you'll get somewhere in life.

"There were times when I ran around with the wrong crowd and would be out until 2:30 in the morning, but he'd have me up at 5:30 and I'd be working all day for him. That kind of curbed that habit pretty quickly because I knew what would be ahead of me the next day if I was out late."

Not that Bryce was a renegade and there was a whole lot of trouble to get into. There were just 19 students in Paup's graduating class, just seven more than when Bryce started kindergarten in Scranton.

"It was a very peaceful place to grow up," Paup said. "You didn't have to worry about drugs. If anyone did them, they were kind of an outcast. There was peer pressure to live up to everyone's standards and to not go against the grain because it was a small area. If anyone got in trouble, the whole town heard about it by the next morning."

Paup returns to Scranton three or four times per year and it still feels like home. At first, though, he had to break the ice with some of his old friends who didn't know how to react to his new-found fame and fortune.

"Everyone kind of stood off and didn't come talk to me because they thought I was different, but I wasn't any different," Paup said. "Now, it's no big deal when I come back and I'll go and hang around the cafe or the machine shop with the guys. It's not like the town has this statue erected of me or a sign that says it's the home of Bryce Paup."

Between chores, Paup managed to squeeze in a little football and basketball. There was always a question of whether Scranton would have enough players to field a football team and Bryce's team finished his senior season with just 12 players.

"You didn't have to count to see if you had enough players on the field, all you had to do was look on the sideline," Paup recalls with a chuckle. "My last game we had just 12 guys, then one of them got his bell rung. He didn't know where he was and it was really cold out there, so we had to sit him in a car for the rest of the game.

"The other team kind of laughed at us when we walked onto the field, but they weren't laughing when we walked off. We beat them something like 45-12."

Scranton has since merged with nearby Jefferson to form one school and Paup has since united with a former Jefferson student: his wife, Denise, whom he met at a church retreat. The two attended Northern Iowa together and have been married for four years. The couple has a 2-year-old son, Alex, who was born the morning of a Packer home game on Nov. 17, 1991. Another child was due in mid June.

"I really didn't want to go to that church retreat, but a cousin of mine was going and he talked me into it," Paup recalls. "The rest, as they say, is history."

Paup is certainly the biggest name to come out of Scranton, but he suggests that Earl Wampler might be more of a local legend. Earl Wampler?

"Back in the 50s when my mom and dad were growing up they had this professional wrestler named Earl Wampler," he said. "He used to train by strapping a plow on his back and running in the fields. My mom says that everyone would come out to watch him."

Playing in the smallest of four divisions in Iowa, Paup attracted the attention of only junior colleges and smaller schools. Northern Iowa, in fact, had never heard of him and it took some coaching from Paup's high school coach, Steve Besch, before they would even look at Paup on film. When they did, they quickly offered Paup a scholarship.

Paup was a three-year starter and four-year letterman for the Division I-AA Panthers, playing both inside and outside backer as well as defensive end and even nose tackle. He had 15 career sacks along with 298 career tackles, six forced fumbles and 24 tackles for losses.

An unheralded middle-round pick, Paup was considered a long shot to make the Packers his rookie season, but his work ethic and versatility landed him a roster spot. Paup spent most of his rookie season on injured reserve with a hand injury suffered during the preseason, seeing action on special teams in just five games.

"That first training camp was really nervewracking," said Paup. "Brian Noble and Johnny Holland were here, and they had just drafted Tony Bennett in the first round and Bobby Houston in the third round. We must have had 12-15 linebackers in camp and I would look around and think: Now, where do I fit into this picture?

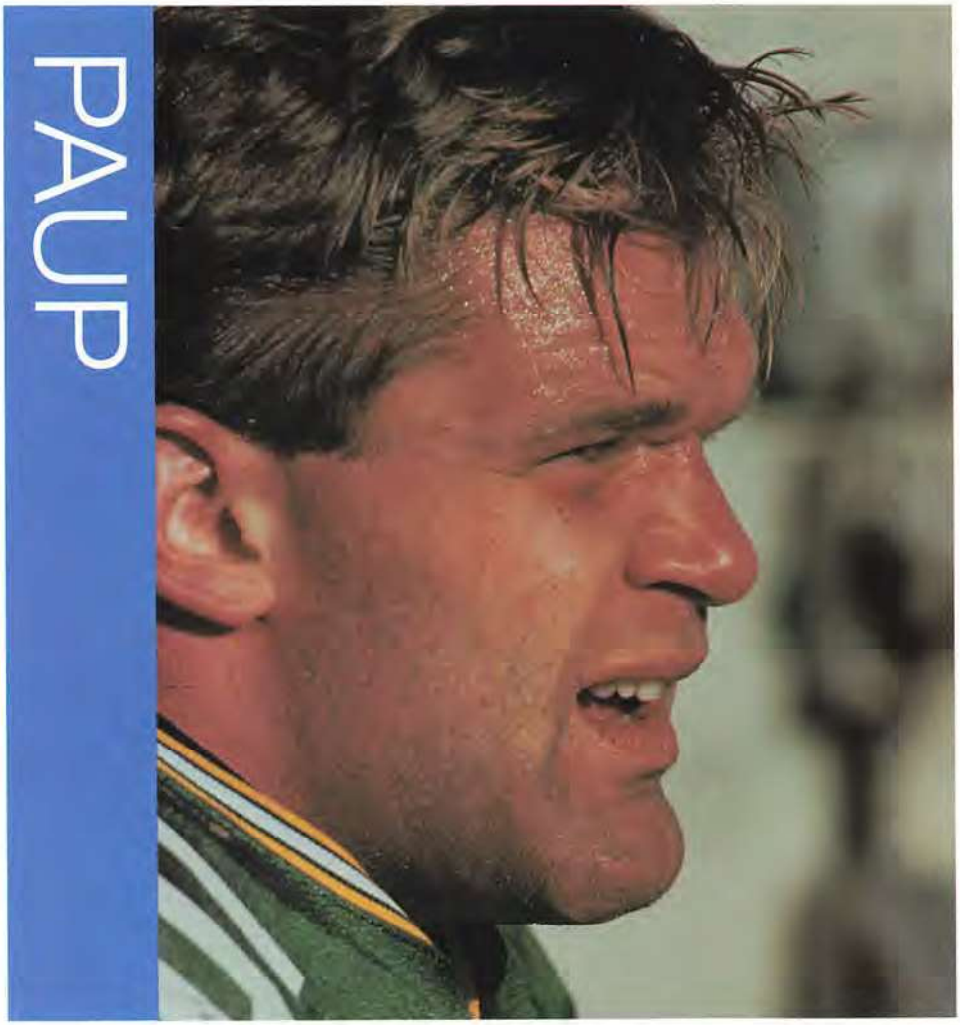
Bryce Paup, always "in" the game, intently studies on-field action from the sideline.



"But I remember one thing Hank Bullough told me as a rookie: 'Just work hard and don't worry about numbers. When you start worrying about numbers, that's when you cut yourself.'"

An avid snowmobiler and outdoorsman, Paup lives in Green Bay year-round and feels it's the ideal city for a small-town boy such as himself.

"I always wanted to play pro football, but I'm not so sure I wouldn't have changed my mind if I was in LA or somewhere like that my rookie year," said Paup. "This is just about the perfect fit for me. I've loved snowmobiling since I was a kid and do it as much as I can in winter. My wife says she's a snowmobile widow."

Paup is currently considered one of the team's best bargains and is finishing out the final year of a three-year contract. He figures to be in for a hefty pay raise next season when he may be in hot demand as a free agent. But don't expect a big contract to alter Paup's helmet size.

"I think my background and upbringing will always help me keep a good perspective on things," he said. "I worked for a long time for $5 per hour and I know where $5 an hour can get you. This (the NFL) gives you a big head start in your life if you can budget your money. I go back to Scranton and see where a lot of hard working people haven't made in years what I make in one season and it makes me very thankful I received this opportunity. I was just in the right place at the right time."

Paup may not strap a plow to his back and run in the fields like Earl Wampler, but the Packers will be more than content if the Scranton sacker continues to plow over quarterbacks at a regular rate.

PRO BOWLERS

Making the playoffs—and winning a playoff game—for the first time in more than a decade provided a happy climax to the Packers' 1993 season.

But, for three of their number, there also was a successful postscript to that accomplishment. Defensive end Reggie White, quarterback Brett Favre and strong safety LeRoy Butler were members of the winning National Football Conference squad in the Pro Bowl, staged in Honolulu's Aloha Stadium on February 6.

Favre, a replacement for the injured Troy Aikman, completed 14 of 24 passing attempts for 135 yards, with 2 interceptions, while seeing extensive action as the NFC prevailed, 17-3. Favre, the first alternate at quarterback in the Pro Bowl balloting, was added to the squad when Aikman withdrew because of a concussion suffered in the NFC championship game against San Francisco.

Defensively, Butler chipped in with 4 unassisted tackles and White, a starter and an eight-time Pro Bowler, weighed in with 3 solo stops. Butler had replaced the Cowboys' Thomas Everett, forced to miss the game because of a shoulder injury.

Wide receiver Sterling Sharpe was named to the NFC squad for the third time in four years but had to bypass the contest because of a turf toe injury which had hampered him for the last half of the regular season and through the playoffs.

One of the fringe benefits to playing in the Pro Bowl is the opportunity for the participants to pose with the official Hawaiian hostesses. The fortunate Packers above, left to right, are LeRoy Butler, Reggie White and Brett Favre, Green Bay's representatives in last January's contest. Sterling Sharpe also was selected—as a starter—but was unable to play because of a foot injury.

CROMWELL MAKES THEM 'SPECIAL'

By Sharon Raboin
Green Bay Press-Gazette

There has been Joe Theismann. There has been Darrell Green. And there has been Wendell Tyler.

In his 20 years in the National Football League, Paul Lanham has coached hundreds of players.

One of them, Lanham says, stands out. And that one is with the Green Bay Packers.

"He's one of the best athletes I've seen in professional football," said Lanham, 64, who lives in Mission Viejo, CA. "Joe Montana is a great quarterback, but he can't tackle anyone."

Who is Lanham talking about? Reggie White? Sterling Sharpe? Brett Favre?

Not close.

His name is Nolan Cromwell, the Packers' special teams coach.

"There wasn't much of anything he couldn't do," said Lanham, who coached the Los Angeles Rams' special teams back when Cromwell played. "He could run, tackle, throw. And he was a hard worker."

Seven years have passed since Cromwell retired as a player. At 39, Cromwell looks like he could knock down passes and make shoestring tackles. He keeps himself in good shape, although his knees swell if he works out too much, the result of 11 years in the league. He weighs 210 pounds, 10 above his playing weight.

Cromwell has been able to switch the competitiveness and determination that led him to a distinguished playing career into coaching. He was a four-time Pro Bowl safety with the Rams and an all-American quarterback at the University of Kansas.

The Packers' special teams were one of the best in the NFL last season under Cromwell's direction. Chris Jacke was an all-pro kicker. Bryan Wagner was a reliable punter. Robert Brooks was a dangerous return man.

The Packers tied for fourth in the NFL last season in a statistical analysis of 17 special teams categories by the Dallas Morning News. It was a significant upgrade over the previous season when the Packers ranked 24th.

The Packers ranked first in three categories:

- Kickoff return average (24.7 yards). The Packers had 11 returns of more than 30 yards, leading Coach Mike Holmgren to say it was the best kickoff return team he had ever been associated with. The last time the Packers led the NFL in kick returns was in 1967 with Travis Williams.
- Extra point percentage (100 percent)
- Opponents' gross punting average (40.2 yards)

The Packers also shared first place fewest points allowed (0) and fewest kicks blocked (0).

Nolan Cromwell, here putting a stopwatch on placekicker Chris Jacke and punter/holder Bryan Wagner, saw his Packer special teams improve dramatically in 1993. They tied for fourth in the NFL as a group based on 17 statistical categories, after ranking 24th in 1992.

"I think Cromwell's one of the brightest young guys in the league, and he'll only get better," Lanham said. "He's very intelligent. There's a lot of guys who are intelligent, but not perceptive. Nolan has good insight."

Cromwell was offered a coaching position with the Rams when he retired in 1987.

But he turned it down.

"I felt I was so close to the players it would have been difficult to be considered a coach rather than a player," Cromwell said. ``Plus I think I needed to get away from the game a little bit to find out if it was what I wanted to do."

Cromwell went into private business. He was the part-owner of three tire stores in the Los Angeles area.

Before long, he missed the game.

When the Rams approached him again about coaching during the 1991 season, Cromwell was more than ready.

"When I had the opportunity to get back into coaching, I jumped at it," Cromwell said. "I missed the competitiveness. The excitement. The striving for excellence. In the stores, they didn't have that burning desire to succeed that you see in an athlete."

Cromwell began his coaching career as a defensive and special teams assistant under Coach John Robinson. He became a special teams coach with the Packers the following season.

That season was a struggle. Returner Terrell Buckley bobbled an alarming number of punts. Punter Paul McJulien was unsteady. Even the kicking game was awful.

Cromwell accepted the blame.

"We didn't do some things as good as we could have and should have," Cromwell said. "I learned a lot. To be a coach instead of a player. To bring them together and make them jell. As a player, I let my actions do the talking."

But Cromwell turned the team in the right direction last season.

"We didn't do anything different scheme-wise," Cromwell said. "I did a better job of coaching, letting them know what I expected and how I wanted it done."

Special teams are an important part of the game. If you make a play, or don't make one, it can turn the game around. Holmgren emphasizes it more than most head coaches. He makes a commitment in the time devoted to special teams in practices and team meetings.

The core of the special teams are the reserves, but starters aren't exempt. Special teams players can be running backs, tight ends, offensive linemen, defensive backs or linebackers. The quickness, strength and athleticism of a player is more important than his position. For instance, last season's wedge consisted of tight end Mark Chmura, offensive lineman Earl Dotson, nose tackle John Jurkovic and running back Dexter McNabb.

"As a backup player, they know they have to play special teams and play it well," Cromwell said. "Mike brings it to their attention very early. If it's between one player or the next (to make the roster), it's whoever is the best special teams player."

Cromwell has the job of selecting players to fill the teams, molding them into a unit and instilling pride.

"The most difficult coaching job in the NFL is special teams," Lanham said. "You have to deal with every player on the team. No other position demands that of a coach."

Cromwell believes in teaching the fundamentals and keeping the schemes basic. Most players don't have experience because they were stars and didn't have to play special teams in college.

"You can't take anything for granted," Cromwell said. "You have to walk them through it step by step. They've never played special teams before."

Change is frequent in personnel. Some backups become starters, like running back Darrell Thompson last year. Others are waived or injured.

But Cromwell enjoys the challenge.

"I played defensive back," Cromwell said. "You'd think that'd be my first coaching job. But I'm glad it's this. I've learned more than I would as a position coach. I deal with everybody on the team. For me, it's been a good move."

Cromwell enjoys a light moment with quarterbacks Ty Detmer (left) and Mark Brunell at a recent mini-camp.

THE 1994 DRAFT:

What was that old saw about "the best laid plans of mice and men?"

Ron Wolf and Mike Holmgren discovered, first hand, just how vexing it can be when carefully crafted "plans"—in the process for months—are abruptly deferred by the capricious football fates, as was the case during the Packers' final mini-camp.

The moment of truth came on a sunny morning in June when Aaron Taylor, their heralded first round selection in the National Football League's 1994 draft, went down with a ruptured patellar tendon in his right knee while engaged in a presumably innocuous one-on-one pass protection maneuver against defensive teammate Don Davey.

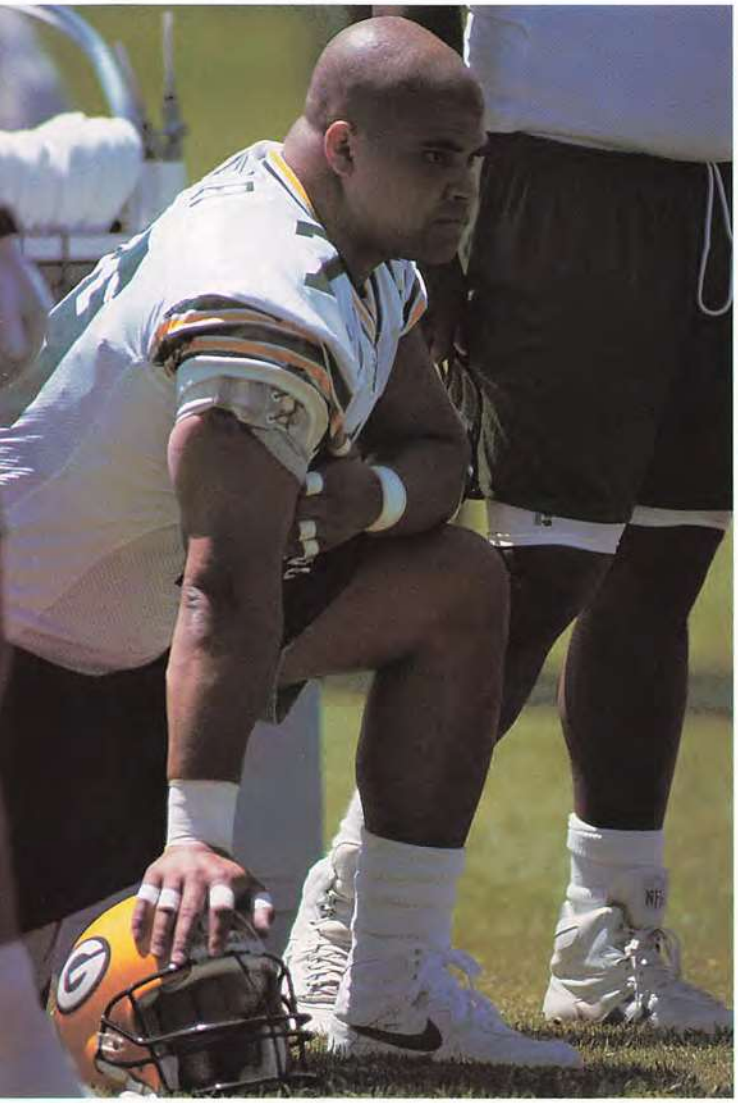
Just a few hours later, it became clear that Taylor would have to undergo knee surgery and would be lost for six months—possibly the entire season.

It was, to be sure, a body blow—even for the highly resilient Wolf and Holmgren. They had shrewdly maneuvered on draft day to acquire the talented Taylor, a player they had pegged as the premier offensive lineman in the draft, by moving up from their scheduled 20th position in the first round to 16th, via an opportune trade with the Miami Dolphins.

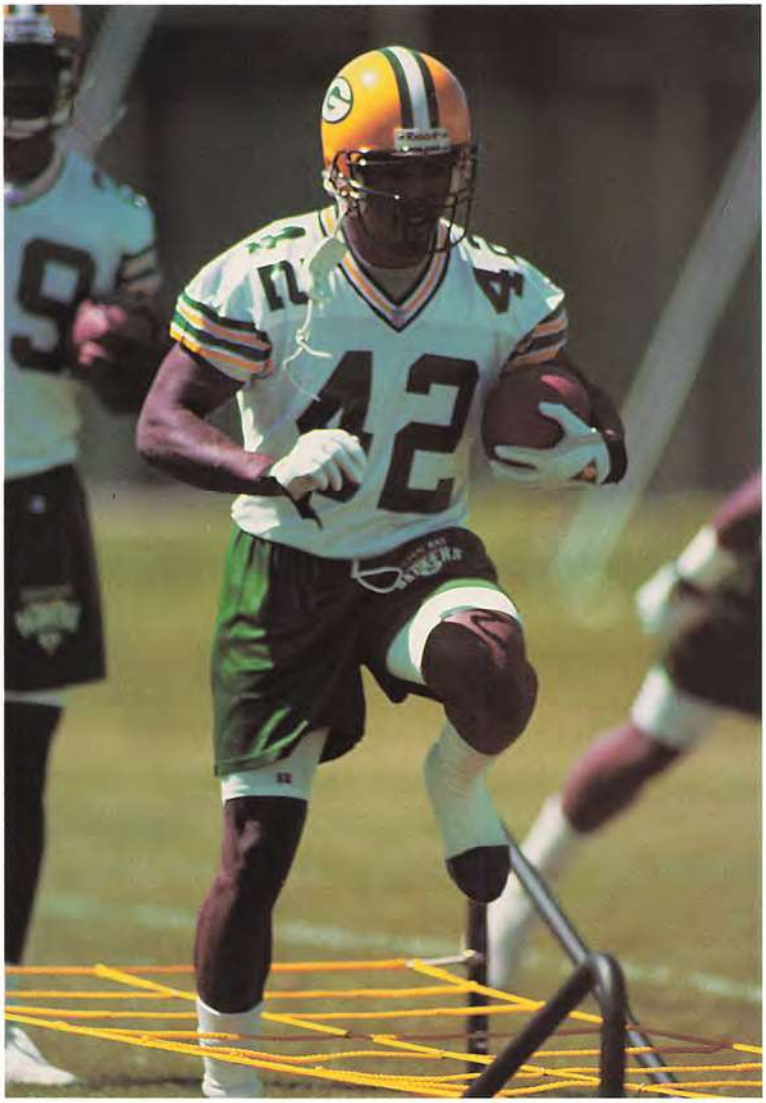
And, once having pulled it off, they had promptly plugged the newcomer in at left guard, the property of veteran Doug Widell at the end of the 1993 season.

Holmgren had said, in fact, "We expect Aaron to play, and play now."

Aaron Taylor, of Notre Dame, then looking forward to a starting role as a rookie, is an observer during a mini-camp practice in Arizona. The Packers' No. 1 draft choice later suffered a knee injury during the team's final mini-camp on June 6 and was lost for six months following surgery.



LeShon Johnson, a third round selection out of Northern Illinois, where he was the nation's leading rusher last season, has been described as "the steal of the draft" by Head Coach Mike Holmgren.



FOOTBALL FATES CHANGE PLANS

"Aaron will be back and he'll be a fine player for us for a lot of years."

That, of course, was April 25—six weeks before Taylor suddenly went down on the South Oneida Street practice field the morning of June 6 and the "plans" abruptly had to be changed.

Though understandably disappointed, Holmgren, characteristically, took the positive approach.

"According to the doctors, he came out nice and clean," he said, sounding an optimistic note following the surgery. "It went as well as it could go.

"Aaron will be back and he'll be a fine player for us for a lot of years."

Holmgren, subsequently having had an opportunity to observe all of his draftees at close hand during a mini-camp, also could take solace in the impressive potential of the Packers' other "name" selection, running back LeShon Johnson of Northern Illinois, an athlete he has described as "the steal of the draft."

The Packers plucked Johnson, the nation's leading rusher in 1993, from the pool in the third round (they did not have a second round pick, having dealt it to the San Francisco 49ers for the third round choice and two sixth round picks).

Pleasantly surprised that Johnson was available at that point in the draft, Holmgren said, "I equate it a little bit to Mark Brunell last year (a Rose Bowl quarterback at the University of Washington who was still on the board in the fifth round for the Packers to select).

"I don't know exactly why (Johnson was there)," the Packer coach noted, adding, "He's very, very productive, very, very tough, very, very fast. He just did a great job. We look at it as a real plus."

The 5-11, 205-pound Johnson, consistently timed below 4.45 in the 40-yard dash, averaged just under 180 yards rushing per game and 6 yards per attempt in leading the nation's collegiate ball carriers last season—imposing figures by any standard, at any competitive level.

Taylor's mini-camp performance validated the Packers' decision to trade up to acquire the 6-foot-3-1/2, 307-pound All-American, rated by most experts as the premier offensive lineman in the draft. Fearful he would not be there when their 20th pick in the first round arrived, Wolf and Holmgren dealt their third round pick in the '94 draft to Miami for the right to change places with the Dolphins.

"We could have sat there and gotten a good player," Wolf said. "But as we got along in the draft, when you have an opportunity to get a player of that caliber, you do it...Any time you have an opportunity to get a player the caliber of Aaron Taylor, everything else is gravy."

A quick and agile pass protector who hits explosively, Taylor was the recipient of last season's Lombardi Award, given annually to the nation's best collegiate lineman/linebacker. Timed at 5.15 seconds in the '40'—highly respectable time for an athlete of his imposing dimensions, Taylor started throughout the '93 season and recorded 66 knockdown blocks.

The intangibles, however, loomed equally as large in the Packers' decision to opt for the 21-year-old lineman.

"He adds a toughness and a leadership quality to our team—even at that young age—that very few people possess," Wolf observed. "He has an innate level of toughness...He's played at an excellent level of football. He's started three years at one of the best levels a person could possibly play at...(And) he has a burning desire to succeed."

Sherman Lewis, the Packers' astute offensive coordinator, delineated some basic and highly practical reasons for the selection of Johnson.

"He just takes it and just runs it as hard as he can," Lewis says of the mercurial rookie. "He's an exciting player. If he gets into the secondary, you're not going to catch him."

Lewis also is impressed by Johnson's versatility.

"He's got the speed to east-west," he said, "and he can also go up inside the tackles...You wouldn't consider him elusive...but he'll just run through arm tackles or weak tackles."

Fritz Shurmur, the Packers' new defensive coordinator, is optimistic about the Green Bay future of fourth round pick Gabe Wilkins, a 6-4-1/2, 292-pound defensive end from Gardner-Webb in North Carolina who runs the '40' in a relatively brisk 4.85 seconds.

Shurmur pronounced himself impressed with Wilkins' "ability to do things big guys don't normally do as well in terms of acceleration, quickness and change of direction."

Defensive end Gabe Wilkins of Gardner-Webb, a fourth round pick, has impressed Fritz Shurmur with his "acceleration, quickness and change of direction."

An All-America selection as a senior, Wilkins registered 8 quarterback sacks and 17 tackles for losses of 76 yards during his final collegiate season.

Beginning with the fifth round, Wolf and Holmgren put heavy emphasis on supplementing the wide receiver position, selecting Terry Mickens of Florida A & M with the first of two picks in that round, then drafting Jay Kearney of West Virginia and "home-grown" Bill Schroeder of the University of Wisconsin-La Crosse with two of four selections in the sixth round.

All three of the newly-acquired wideouts have one asset in common—exceptional size for the position. Mickens, who played under former Packer defensive backfield coach Ken Riley at Florida A&M, is 6-1 and 202 pounds, Kearney 6-2 and 192 pounds and Schroeder 6-3 and 200 pounds.

Although not a so-called "burner"—he does the '40' in 4.6 seconds—Mickens is a fluid runner with impressive deep acceleration and exceptional hands. He also has been productive, averaging over 17 yards per catch over his four-year varsity career, a tough receiver over the middle and an elusive runner after the catch.

Kearney, who averaged an imposing 28 yards per reception as a senior, boasts the kind of speed that would provide the Packers with the deep threat to complement Sterling Sharpe. Kearney, the recipient of 25 passes last season, has been clocked at a swift 4.41 seconds in the '40.

Schroeder, a Sheboygan, WI., native, admittedly is a long shot because he hails from a Division III program and played only one year of college football. But he has exceptional physical assets—outstanding speed (he's been caught in the 4.3s in the '40') to go with excellent size. Possessor of a 25.1-yard average for 30 receptions last season, he also is a track All-American. He went to the most recent Olympic trials in the decathlon and finished eighth in the nation in that event.

The Packers moved to augment their offensive backfield with a second selection in the fifth round, tapping 6-foot-1, 231-pound Dorsey Levens of Georgia Tech with a choice obtained in a draft day trade from San Francisco.

Levens' versatility—he can play either halfback or fullback—intrigued Wolf, Holmgren—and Lewis, who provided the bottom line. Describing him as a "slip and slide runner," Lewis explained, "We felt we couldn't pass him up."

Levens launched his college career at Notre Dame and won the starting tailback job in spring drills as a sophomore in 1990, then suffered a knee injury. He subsequently transferred to Georgia Tech the following year. Last season, he posted a remarkable 7.2-yard rushing average, gaining 823 yards. In addition to having good size, he also is an outstanding blocker and has excellent hands—an ideal combination for the Holmgren offensive system.

Wolf and Holmgren acquired a pair of linebackers—Ruffin Hamilton of Tulane and Paul Duckworth of the University of Connecticut—with their other two draft selections, both in the sixth round.

Hamilton, 6-2 and 227 pounds, is a talented, all-around athlete who, in addition to playing football at Tulane, competed in track in the weights and the 400 meters. And, as a junior, he played 10 games of varsity basketball before his coach directed him to concentrate on football.

Although he played outside linebacker at Tulane, dropping into coverage on occasion and also rushing the quarterback, Hamilton begins his Packer indoctrination at the retired Johnny Holland's "inside" position.

The 6-1, 240-pound Duckworth, who played all along the defensive line and at outside linebacker during his Connecticut career, also launches his rookie season at inside linebacker—at the strong side post where Bryce Paup closed out the '93 campaign following the injury loss of Brian Noble. A highly productive performer, Duckworth registered nine games with 10 or more tackles as a senior, including a 22-tackle game against Towson State and an 18-tackle performance against Furman.

FOOTBALL'S A SNAP FOR FRANK WINTERS

by Chuck Carlson
Appleton Post-Crescent

One snap.

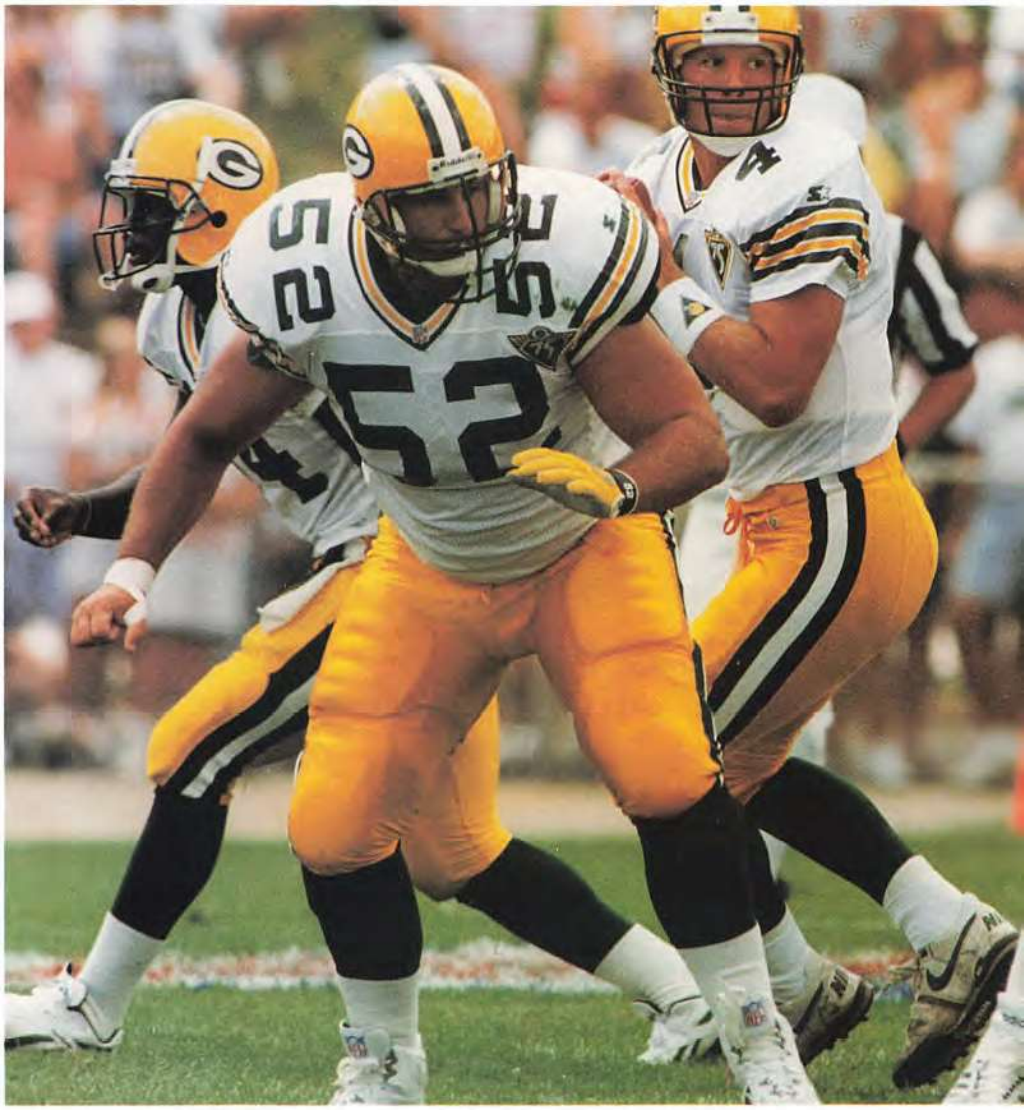
That was it.

The Green Bay Packers ran off nearly 1,000 plays from scrimmage last season and Frank Winters, a journeyman offensive lineman who wasn't sure at the beginning of the season if he'd play at all, missed one snap.

Regular season. Pre-season. Everything. Had he been asked, he probably would've been in on every snap in every practice as well.

It's what you do, though, when the opportunity presents itself. And when Winters got his chance, he held onto it as if his life depended on it.

IRON MAN: Center Frank Winters, here shielding quarterback Brett Favre, is one of the most durable performers in recent Packer history. He missed only one snap during the 1993 season.



As Winters remembers it, the only play he missed in 1993 came in the Oct. 31 game against the Chicago Bears at Lambeau Field.

"I got a shoulder burner or something like that," he said. "The referee blew the whistle to see if I was all right. Then he made me leave the game for a play. I could've played. I felt fine."

Winters returned the next play and never left again.

It was a record for durability that's rarely seen in the NFL these days, when players are shuttled in and out of a game at a dizzying pace.

But more than that, Winters' indestructibility was critical for the Packers, who were decimated by injuries on the offensive line all season.

But Winters, the 6-foot-3, 290-pound eighth-year pro from Western Illinois, never faltered. Winters first got the call in the pre-season, subbing for the injured James Campen at center. When the season started, Campen returned and Winters moved to left guard to take over for the ailing Rich Moran.

When Campen went down again with a season-ending hamstring injury the fourth game of the season, Winters again answered the call, moving back to center and staying there the rest of the year.

"When the season was over, I was tired," said Winters. "It was a long season. But I was glad to have the opportunity. It sure beat sitting on the bench."

Winters doesn't figure to have to worry about that this season either. He'll go in as Green Bay's No. 1 center.

It's been that versatility that has allowed Winters to stay in the NFL.

"He came in as a backup and you like your backups to play more than one position," said Green Bay offensive line coach Tom Lovat. "Frankie's versatility has kept him around. Plus, he's a very good center. I don't know if you can say center is a natural position for anyone, but Frankie's a good one. He's smart, plus he's a little bit quicker athlete than people give him credit for."

And Winters will play anywhere, any time.

Though he's made a career out of being a center and a guard, he'd even take a crack at tackle if necessary.

"If it was to help the team, I'd take a shot at it," he said.

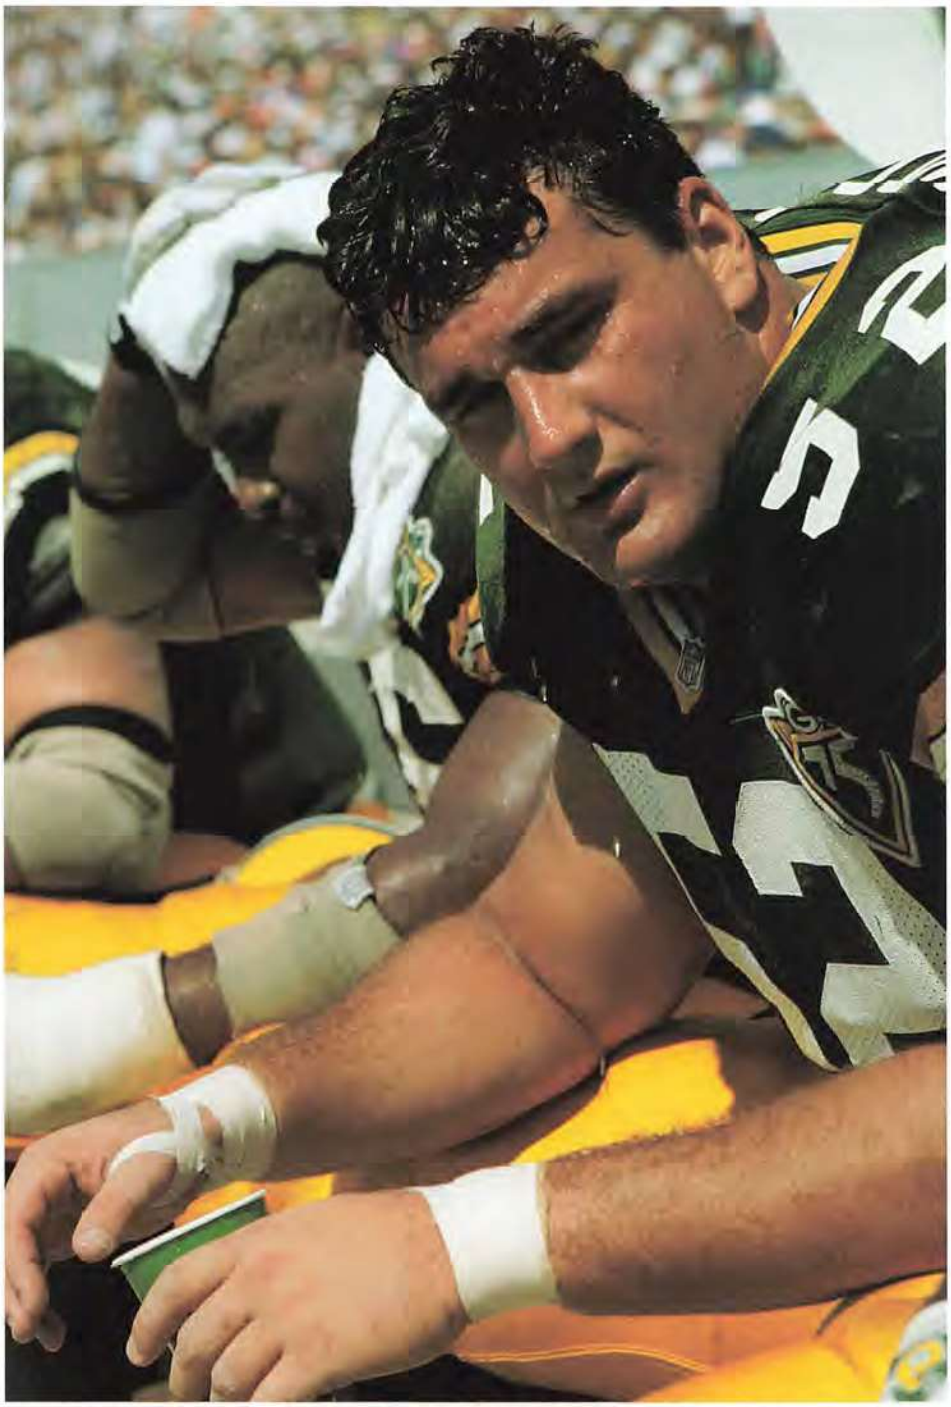
More important, the Packers would too.

"I wouldn't be afraid to put Frankie out at tackle in an emergency," Lovat said. "If he had to play right tackle, he could do it."

Winters is under no illusions about himself or his career.

He was the 10th-round draft choice of the Cleveland Browns in 1987 and played there two seasons before signing as a Plan B free agent with the New York Giants in 1989. In 1990, he again signed as a Plan B free agent with the Kansas City Chiefs.

But with all those teams, his duties were essentially the same. He'd get the occasional start and play well, but once the top guy was healthy, he'd return to his role as a reserve and longsnapper.



Frank Winters, who came to the Packers in 1992 as a Plan B backup, has become an integral factor in the offensive line. He started all 16 games at center in 1993, after making 11 starts in '92—three at center and eight at left guard.

In 1992, he came to the Packers again in Plan B with the hope of perhaps breaking out of that backup mold.

He got his chance.

He played in all 16 games and started 11—three at center and eight at left guard—and did a solid job. Then came his ironman duty last year.

What has helped Winters more than anything else has been his ability to stay free of injury.

"With Frankie, he gives you the impression that he doesn't look like he's in as good condition as he is," Lovat said. "But he keeps good track of his condition. He's got a lot of endurance. Frankie figured out that to play the game, you have to be in shape."

Through it all, though, Winters is just thankful he has gotten the chance to prove himself.

"I think I've gained some respect from my peers," he said. "I had an opportunity and I showed I could play. I think I'm finally recognized as a starter in this league"

FANTASY CAMP JOURNAL: DIARY OF A DREAM

by Jim Lyman

In an article written last year, veteran Packer pundit Art Daley chose the greatest and worst games he felt the Green Bay Packers had ever played.

Picking from over 1,200 contests, Daley chose the December 31, 1967 Ice Bowl as the greatest and the 56 to 0 whipping by the Baltimore Colts on November 2, 1958 as the worst.

As a veteran fan, I fully agreed with Daley's choices. In fact, my ties to those two games are probably the reason I spent several memorable days last June attending the 1993 Green Bay Experience Fantasy Football Camp.

The Colts massacre was, oddly enough, the day I became a real fan. I'd only been a casual observer of the Pack until then. But as I watched the game unfold on television I found myself rooting hard for those pathetic Packers. I've been a diehard fan ever since.

And I was at Lambeau for Daley's greatest game. I have proof! I still have my twelve dollar ticket to the Ice Bowl. After the game, I was one of the thousands of frigid fans who warmed up by stomping around on Lambeau's frozen sod. More than a quarter of a century later, I was once again able to set foot on Lambeau's turf during the fantasy camp.

In his book, "Instant Replay", Green Bay's Jerry Kramer chronicled the Packers splendid 1967 season. His diary was a fascinating glimpse into what it's really like to play football at the highest level. Hopefully, this account will be a similar experience for Packer Yearbook readers, because I'm convinced the fantasy camp is the highest level of fun any fan can ever have.

Sunday, June 6, 1993

The fantasy camp kicked off this evening in the tradition rich Packer Hall of Fame. In addition to the campers and most of the former Packer greats, Packer General Manager Ron Wolf and Alabama defensive back George Teague, a 1993 first round draft pick, were there.

There was plenty of time for socializing and autographs, and I was impressed at how friendly and down-to-earth the Packer players were. In fact, the conversations served up by the Packers were one of the most unforgettable aspects of the camp for me.

Throughout, we were treated to fascinating memories and anecdotes about a special time and place by the men who helped make that time and place so special.

At dinner, Willie Wood told a wonderfully funny story about LeRoy Caffey taking over for an injured Ray Nitschke during the short-lived "runner up" bowl against the St. Louis Cardinals in Miami.

After we ate, we faced the camp's most difficult challenge. We rookies had to stand individually and sing our school song for the group's listening "pleasure".

Ray Nitschke orchestrated the songfest and, needless to say, the Hall-of-Fame middle linebacker won all of the arguments with campers who were a bit shy. He even won the one with 73-year-old Louis DeFurio, the camp's elder statesman.

"I think I'm a veteran," DeFurio said. "I saw Don Hutson play. I saw Tobin Rote play." But Nitschke would have none of that argument and DeFurio was soon up on his chair just like the rest of us.

Following the "songs", we gathered around the Super Bowl I trophy for pictures—a perfect ending to a perfect day.

Monday, June 7, 1993

After breakfast, we headed to the classroom. The subject was Packer Football 101 as taught by Boyd Dowler, Jerry Kramer and Willie Wood. The text? The Vince Lombardi playbook.

Wood, of course, covered defense and brought lots of life to the various "X's" and "O's". Dowler sprinkled in some colorful comments during his presentation on the Packer offense. He called one pass route a "haul ass and get down there" pattern as opposed to a "sucker/weasel" play.

Kramer shared his theory as to why Paul Hornung was so accomplished at the Green Bay sweep. He pointed out that Hornung had 5 flat "speed", about the same as the pulling guards who lead him around the corner.

Current Packer linebacker Brian Noble was next on the agenda. He told us what it was like to face Brett Favre in practice.

"I've actually heard the ball go by when Brett throws it—it whistles. Sometimes he'll try to throw the ball through you to get it to the receiver."

That afternoon, we put into practice what we learned in the classroom. A nice touch prior to leaving for Ashwaubenon Stadium was having just retired Packer Trainer Domenic Gentile tape our ankles.

Packer quarterback Ken O'Brien not only threw to campers during this session, but he showed his toughness by holding the ball for campers who wanted to kick field goals. Former Ice Bowl center Ken Bowman, now a Green Bay attorney, tirelessly snapped the ball to camper quarterback wannabees.

That evening, we were treated to reflections of Super Bowl I by the players who won the initial face-off between the National Football League and the American Football League.

At the time, NFL supporters said it would be unthinkable for the Packers to lose to the Kansas City Chiefs. This "must win" attitude created immense pressures for Coach Lombardi and his team, the players said. The Packers, of course, were equal to the challenge and the Chiefs were soundly defeated.

Tuesday, June 8, 1993

We were eating breakfast when Bart and Cherry Starr walked into the room. Starr was the final Packer to arrive at camp and he apologized profusely for being late.

All of the Packer players seemed somewhat larger than life, but Starr stood out. The "star" quality of Starr was evident later in the day when he was featured at the "Welcome to Green Bay" luncheon. About 300 folks turned out to see their heroes and to welcome we campers.

Starr said he had learned that Ray Scott, the great Packer announcer from the 1960s, had recently moved to Green Bay. Scott was at the luncheon and Starr had the audience rise for an ovation to welcome the broadcaster home.

Another luncheon highlight was Dick Schaap, ABC Sports personality and co-author with Jerry Kramer of the Packer classic "Instant Replay".

Schaap told us why "tiny" Green Bay has been able to survive in the rough and tumble world of professional football for 75 years. He says it's a result of "fierce civic pride and great leaders, especially in Curly Lambeau and Vince Lombardi. Besides, if Green Bay didn't have the Packers, all they could brag about would be toilet paper."

Schaap also praised the fantasy camp, saying "this camp is unique, based on a unique mystique. I don't think any other football fantasy camp would have the same appeal, substance or success."

The Fantasy Camp's "father", Dick Peal, fully agrees with Schaap about the camp's qualities and points out that it is indeed the only fantasy football camp around.

Following the luncheon, we toured the Packer facilities, including the indoor practice center, Packer headquarters and the weight room. We ended inside the Packer locker room, where the trophy for winning Super Bowl II had been placed on display. Jerry Kramer stood next to it as he talked about the final game the Packers played for Vince Lombardi.

That dramatic moment was followed by an experience with equal emotional impact. We walked out of the locker room, down the tunnel and onto Lambeau Field. We were about to reenact the Ice Bowl's game winning touchdown.

Before the replay, Packer players shared their memories of the game. A nasty storm was brewing and thunder and lighting occasionally interrupted their reminiscences.

But we also had a more pleasant interruption when we spotted a familiar-looking figure walking across the field. It was Packer Head Coach Mike Holmgren who had come by to visit. He greeted us and spoke of his pride at being a part of the Packer organization.

Each of us had our picture taken with the trio of Tony Canadeo, Bart Starr and Ray Nitschke. With Don Hutson, these three Hall-of-Fame players are the only Packers whose jersey numbers have been retired.

Wednesday, June 9, 1993

Golf was on the agenda for the camp's final day. But some of us wondered if we'd be able to play as we drove south on Highway 43 towards the Blackwolf Run golf complex. Although the courses had been hit hard by the storm, we were able to get in our round.

I played in a foursome with Jan Stenerud, who is so good he's on the celebrity golf circuit with the likes of Michael Jordan. Not only is Stenerud an excellent golfer, he's obviously an exceptional judge of talent since he complimented me more than once on the strength of my short game!

Thursday, June 10, 1993

Our golf awards banquet back at the Midway Motor Lodge that evening completed the fantasy camp experience. Prizes were awarded, team photos were passed out and there was a final chance to share stories with teammates and friends.

One final note. I was wrong when I said last evening was the end of our experience. We campers had been told we were "on our own" for breakfast. However, we not only dined with the out-of-town Packers who were at the motel, but local Packers Ray Nitschke and Fuzzy Thurston returned to share a final cup of coffee and to say a friendly good-bye to their new acquaintances .

WAR WAS ON WHEN PACKERS

by Art Daley
Editor Emeritus

Fifty years ago the Packers won the National Football League championship, but their accomplishment was tempered by a world at war.

The year was 1944 and it was a nasty time. Our country was in its third full year of World War II, fighting the forces of Hitler's Germany and Hirohito's Japan on two distant fronts.

The NFL was in its 25th year and, like baseball, sports were deemed important as a diversion in wartime.

The Packers opened training camp in early August—the day U.S. armed forces drove the Nazis out of Paris. On December 17, when the Packers beat the New York Giants for the league title in New York's Polo Grounds, the Germans and Japs were on the run.

As it is now, the opening of Packer training camp was a big event back then. Coach Curly Lambeau and his two assistants, George Trafton and player-coach Don Hutson, welcomed 42 players and the crowd watching the exercises was estimated at 500, a huge audience then.

The NFL cut its schedule to 10 games—plus the championship game between the champs of the Eastern and Western divisions. The player limit was 28, pretty high considering the athletes played offense and defense.

The Packer roster fluctuated quite a bit as some of the players were inducted into service, while others were turned down. The NFL kept a service roster and the Packers listed more than 40 players, most in the Army. One Packer player was killed in action—Capt. Howard (Smiley) Johnson, a guard, died on the ninth day of the Iwo Jima invasion.

The 1944 season and championship marked the end of Lambeau's great run—six NFL titles, three straight starting in 1929 and then in 1936 and 1939. His last hurrah was in '44 and five years later he departed the Pack.

Pete Tinsley, a tough Packer guard for eight seasons (1938-45) and now a gentleman fisherman in Florence, WI, put his period this way: "They talk about the Glory Years (the 1960s under Vince Lombardi) but we were the first Glory Years. We had some great teams, too."

Tinsley also agreed that "maybe we're approaching Glory Years No. 3."

Football of the 1930s, 1960s and now the 1990s really hasn't changed that much. It was and always will be a contest of blocking and tackling. It's still 60 minutes and the field is still 100 yards (300 feet) long and 160 feet wide.

Since winning the championship in 1939, the Packers had played second fiddle to the hated Chicago Bears the next four years and there was no reason to believe 1944 would be any different. In the four years starting in 1940, the Packers were 1-6-1 vs. the Bears despite going 31-9-3.

Thus, the Bear game in Green Bay Sept. 24, 1944 had considerable importance. It was the opener for the Bears and Game 2 for the Packers who had barely nudged the Brooklyn Dodgers the Sunday before 14-7.

The Bears were led by their great quarterback, Sid Luckman, while the Pack's passing was done by left halfback Irv Comp since the Notre Dame-boxed Bays were still three years removed from the QB under the center. The Packers also slipped into the single wing at times, using what is now called a tight end.

It was a crazy game. The Packers got off to a 28-0 lead but the Bears stormed back and tied the score midway in the fourth quarter. With only a few minutes left Lou Brock ran 42 years for a 34-28 lead and in the final minute Ted Fritsch intercepted a Luckman pass in the flat and ran 45 years for the victory.

WON TITLE 50 YEARS AGO

Ted Fritsch, Packer fullback, looking for opening to get around Clyde "Bulldog" Turner during Packer-Bear game.

Fritsch, of course, made his Packer name as a fullback but then the players went both ways and he was at left linebacker when he made the interception.

Interestingly, the coaches of both teams worked that day from the press box. Lambeau telephoned instructions to Assistant George Trafton on the bench. Bear owner George Halas was in the Navy and Luke Johnsos and Hunk Anderson co-coached the team, with Johnsos working upstairs.

When a Don Hutson touchdown catch made it 28-0, Lambeau yelled into the telephone "pour it on." After the game he said "the second half proved that you never can let down. We just relaxed with that big lead."

The Packers won their first six games before they ran into the Bears in Chicago and this time they couldn't score a point, while the Bears got 21. In the final three games, the only loss was another blanking, 24-0, vs. the Giants in New York.

In the year's last home game, the Packers downed the Cleveland Rams 30 to 21 and one of the big guns that day was Tony Canadeo, who was to become (in 1949) the first Packer to gain 1,000 yards rushing. Canadeo was a corporal in the Army at Fort Bliss, TX, and was given a furlough to be with his wife, Ruthe, for the birth of their son, Bob.

Canadeo, recently retired as a member of the Pack's Executive Committee, said, "Curly asked me if I wanted to play so I said yes." Canadeo carried only 12 times but piled up 107 yards.

When the season ended the Packers won the West with an 8-2 record while the Giants took the East with 8-1-1, including a 31-0 pasting of the Washington Redskins in the season windup. Due to wartime restrictions, especially travel, the Packers ended their season Nov. 26 vs. Card-Pitt at Chicago while the Giants closed Dec. 10 at Washington.

The title game had a strange twist: Arnie Herber, former passing ace with the Packers (1930-40), was coaxed out of retirement by New York coach Steve Owen to play the 1944 season. A little hefty after three years of retirement, Herber could still throw it and hurled three TD passes to beat Green Bay Nov. 19 in New York.

Lambeau took the Packers to the University of Virginia at Charlottesville to prepare for the championship game. Lambeau was unhappy with the Packers' passing attack, calling it "less than satisfactory." He also noted, in reference to the embarrassing shutout loss to the Giants, "the revenge angle won't be missing and the spirit of the team has left nothing to be desired."

Historians generally credit Lambeau with being a major factor in winning the 1944 title. The Giants read and heard Lambeau's frequent references to his "poor" passing attack and undoubtedly felt Lambeau was fibbing. They concentrated on stopping Hutson, then the pass receiving scourge of the NFL.

The Packers came out rushing the football and threw only 11 passes, completing just three. Hutson was used as a decoy and sometimes the Giants had three defenders on him. Joe Laws rushed for 74 yards in 13 carries while Fritsch carried 17 times for 58 yards and scored two touchdowns.

Charlie Brock, Packer center, returns the ball after his famous "theft" play. Al Gryco, Chicago Bear halfback, was the victim, in Green Bay's 42 to 28 victory over the Bears in 1944.

THE 1944 PACKERS, CURLY LAMBEAU'S LAST CHAMPIONSHIP TEAM

Front Row: 43 Charles Goldenberg, G; 42 Paul Duhart, B; 63 Ben Starret, B; 21 Pete Tinsley, G; 72 Forrest McPherson, C; 54 Larry Craig, E; 29 Charlie Brock, Capt., C; 16 Lou Brock, B; 3 Roy McKay, B; & 24 Joe Laws, B.

The Pack scored twice in the second quarter. Laws got Green Bay in position with a 20-yard run to the Giants 28 and then Fritsch reeled off 20 yards to the one. From there Fritsch scored on fourth down after a timeout.

Later in the period Comp and Hutson worked a 22-yard pass to the New York 30. After Fritsch ran for two, Comp found Fritsch all alone on the 18 and Ted scored standing up while the Giants' secondary followed Hutson.

On defense the big hero was Laws, an 11-year veteran. Having played with Herber, Laws really knew Arnie's touch and intercepted three of his passes. Paul Duhart, a rookie, killed a Giant threat in the fourth quarter with the fourth interception. Herber had one moment of glory, completing a 41-yard pass to Frank Liebel to set up a one-yard TD run by Ward Cuff.

Lambeau said, "This was the first time our team operated at full efficiency. If ever a team deserved to win a championship game, this team did. Special credit should be given those trap blocks up the middle that helped pave the way for Joe Laws." Three Packers went the full 60 minutes-Larry Craig, blocking QB and defensive end; Charlie Brock, center and linebacker; and Hutson, offensive end and defensive back.

The game drew 46,016, a big crowd considering wartime and being a week before Christmas. Each Packer player received $1,449.71 while each Giant got $814.36.

Those figures are peanuts in the 1990s but back then it didn't cost a leg and an arm to live. Try these: Pork chops, 33 cents a pound; toilet tissue, 3 rolls for 13 cents; a man's shirt, $3.95; potatoes, 10 pounds for 49 cents; women's dresses, $6 to $50; and a smoking(?) jacket, $7.95.

The Packers arrived in Green Bay late Monday night and, despite near-zero weather, a crowd of more than 1,500 was at the railroad station to cheer as they stepped off the train. It would be 15 more years before the Packers received a welcome home. That was in Lombardi's first year when they returned (to the airport) from winning their last two games in 1959.

THE CARING FOR THE GREEN

by Tom Murphy
Green Bay Press-Gazette

Ken Ruettgers put it plainly.

"Lambeau is the best field in the NFL, even John Madden says so."

Ruettgers, who has started 110 consecutive regular season and playoff games at left tackle for the Green Bay Packers, has the credentials to make the observation about his home playground, Lambeau Field.

"I've played in every NFL stadium," he said. This will be Ruettgers' 10th year in the National Football league.

"Some California and Florida people do a pretty good job. But our people seem to always have the right moisture and the right (grass) density.

"In fact, I think they do too good a job. It's too fast. They should let the grass grow a little and slow everybody down to my speed."

Lambeau Groundskeeper Todd Edlebeck is the object of Ruettgers good-natured barb.

At the ripe old age of 30, Edlebeck has been the Packers' grounds supervisor seven years. It's his job to get Lambeau Field in shape for game day and to minimize the beating 80 or 90 football players can dish out to the pair of grass practice fields during the heat of July and August.

Lambeau Field has two acres of grass. There are four acres of sod practice fields and another four acres or so of ersatz grass in the new Don Hutson Center across South Oneida Street.

Edlebeck's been working on the Packers' fields and with the buildings grounds maintenance crew since 1980, his sophomore year at Ashwaubenon High School.

He was born and raised literally in the shadows of Lambeau Field. In fact, his parents' home is just four houses south of the stadium on the same side of Ridge Road. Edlebeck, his wife, Julie, and son Matthew, 4, now live just a half-mile west of Lambeau Field.

"Sometimes my wife feels I love this field more than her.

"But, really," Edlebeck said, tongue deep in cheek, "they're equal.

"I'm an outdoor person. When I was 12, I was cutting three and four lawns a week for people. Then a friend, Judge Clarence Nier, who was really nice to me, asked me if I wanted to help out the city."

The late Judge Nier was Green Bay city attorney before becoming a circuit judge. Most importantly for Edlebeck, Nier also was president of the City Stadium Commission the citizen board that oversaw Lambeau Field operations before the Packers assumed the responsibility in 1983.

Edlebeck leapt at Nier's offer.

He and Ted Eisenreich, the Packers' buildings supervisor, worked together for the first five years, each doing a little bit of everything, Edlebeck said. With just five full-time and three summer employees, there's no leeway for strict adherence to job descriptions.

"In fact, we still do whatever has to be done. I paint, I weld, I clean. Grass isn't a full-time job."

Except from late April through December or later, if the Packers continue their recent winning ways.

"We only get 10 to 15 percent of the grass (an annual, shallow-rooted variety) back each year." Edlebeck said. "So each spring we thatch it, scrape it and aerate it. When the field gets to 55 or 60 degrees in mid to late-May, we seed it and water, water, water.

"The more you water and fertilize, that's what's going to make your lawn thick and rich. It can make it as nice as a carpet." Lambeau Field alone takes about 2,700 pounds of fertilizer each year on top of about 500 pounds of grass seed. The amounts are double for the grass practice fields.

There's a catch, however.

"If it is too thick, it won't breathe. So you have to aerate to level it and keep it healthy.

"Leveling is important because when you have expensive players like you have now-a-days, you can't afford to have a pothole out there."

In the next two or three years, if an existing timetable holds, Lambeau Field could be one big pothole.

The electric blanket, a system of wire squares about eight inches under the surface that was installed by Vince Lombardi 30 years ago, will be replaced by a glycol anti-freeze solution.

"We will be able to control the temperature better and be able to raise it, if we want, and keep it on for games," Edlebeck said. European soccer fields have used glycol for years and the Chicago Bears recently installed the system at their Lake Forest, IL, practice facility.

Lambeau Field's electric current now must be turned off before the players take the field. Electricity can become a liability problem, especially with moisture and chain gangs with metal poles, players with cleats and miles of television cables.

"We're not going to take that chance," Edlebeck said.

At the same time the heating is updated, the playing surface will be lowered a foot or two to improve the view from the lower rows of seats.

"That's Bob's (Packers President Bob Harlan) goal. To keep making Lambeau Field the best in the the NFL. It's why the Packers do everything: to make it the best."

Packers controller Dick Blasczyk estimated the annual Lambeau Field maintenance budget at about $75,000.

"The administration is real good to us," Edlebeck said. "We never go without anything we need so we can make it the best for people.

"We want people to come here and say, 'Lambeau Field is THE place to see a football game.' The Packers have the money and they are willing to spend it to make the fans feel comfortable."

And the players;

Nine-year inside linebacker Brian Noble echoed Ruettgers:

"There's no question in my mind that Lambeau Field is the best field I ever played on and that it always was in the best condition."

Noble, whose stellar and steady career was cut short last year by injury not due to the playing surface, had a parting shot for the fake grass: "Any player in his right mind is going to prefer playing on the natural surface to playing in the street."

Edlebeck, although he's also responsible for the fake surface of The Don Hutson facility, agrees.

"Football was meant to be played on grass. It was meant for outdoors. So am I."

MR. MOM ROLE KEY TO WAGNER'S RISE

by Jim Hayes
Green Bay Press-Gazette

Being placed on the waiver wire can be a traumatic experience for any NFL player.

But for Bryan Wagner, being cut by the Green Bay Packers during the 1992 exhibition season proved to be a short-lived setback that gradually pumped life back into his sagging career.

Having been waived when the Packers decided to keep Paul McJulien as their punter, Wagner spent the next couple of months at home taking care of his son, Matthew, while his wife, Robin, went to work each day as a television news anchor.

"I was playing Mr. Mom," Wagner said. "I just realized from those couple of months what was important in my life. I put God first, family second, and then the career comes third. When I put those priorities in order it was so much easier to play."

Wagner returned to the Packers on Nov. 9 for the final seven games of the '92 season after McJulien was released, and quickly brought stability to a punting game that had floundered under McJulien, who had punted well as a rookie in 1991. Whereas pressure and stress have ruined many promising punters—and seemed to take a toll on McJulien—Wagner said his realization that other things in life are more important than football has helped him to perform at a high level since he returned to the Packers to finish the '92 season.

"That allows me to be more relaxed out there," he said. "That's the attitude I have to have. That's why I think I had a great year last year."

Wagner, indeed, made a valuable contribution last year as the Packers advanced to the second round of the playoffs. In his seventh NFL season, Wagner punted 74 times for a career-high 42.9-yard average, which was the highest gross average by a Green Bay punter since Ron Widby averaged 43.1 yards in 1973.

Nolan Cromwell, the Packers special teams coach, agrees the mental adjustments, rather than physical ones, have made Wagner a better punter since the Packers decided to release him during the '92 training camp.

"I think he feels very comfortable with the coaches here and I'm talking mainly about Mike Holmgren and Ron Wolf," Cromwell said. "They respect his ability and he's expressed to me that he feels that the organization is behind him. We all have a lot of confidence in Bryan, and that has helped his confidence and his ability to concentrate."

Along with his impressive gross average, Wagner's 36.3 net average was the best by a Packers punter since the NFL began keeping the stat in 1976. He also dropped 19 punts inside the 20-yard line, and gave the Packers a reliable holder on field goals and extra points.

Whether or not it was the "altitude" displayed here, punter Bryan Wagner saw his average soar to a career high (42.9 yards for 74 punts) in 1993. It was the highest gross average by a Packer punter since Ron Widby averaged 43.1 yards in 1973.

To summarize, Wagner entered training camp this summer after having the best year of his career in 1993. But before finding happiness and a bit of security in Green Bay, Wagner also had been released by both Cleveland and New England before receiving his first tryout with the Packers.

Having been waived by New England after the third game of the '91 season, Wagner said he refused to call it quits when he was axed by the Packers less than a year later.

"I thought it might be over but I knew I could still punt and play in the NFL," he said. "I knew I wasn't getting released on my ability. Whenever I got released, it was never exactly a head-to-head competition and I lost out because the other guy was better than me."

Wagner attended high school in the San Diego area and then attended Cal State-Northridge. After two solid seasons with the Chicago Bears, Wagner signed as a Plan B free agent with Cleveland in 1989. In his first year with the Browns, Wagner placed a league-high 32 punts inside the 20 and helped the team to the AFC Championship Game, where the Browns fell to Denver 37-21.

However, the Browns stumbled to a 3-13 record the following season and Wagner was released.

Wagner, said he could understand the reasoning behind the decisions when both the Packers and Patriots gave him the pink slip. But his dismissal from Cleveland, where his wife was working in television, still draws his ire.

In his final year with the Browns, Wagner had four punts blocked over a three-game stretch, but he says poor protection and snaps were the reasons for the blocks. After the rash of blocks, Wagner said his coaches told him to just get the ball off and not worry about his average.

"I suffered in the end because my average wasn't good," Wagner said. "I know I didn't have a great year but the team didn't either. It hurt me when I got released. It's still kind of a bitter taste. But if I didn't get cut I wouldn't be where I am now."

In Week 15 last season, the Packers clinched their first playoff berth since 1982 by beating the Los Angeles Raiders in sub-zero weather at Lambeau Field. Known for being a punter who can handle the cold, Wagner boomed a 61-yarder and placed three punts inside the 20 in a 28-0 victory.

"They were saying I was a good cold-weather punter back when I was in Cleveland," Wagner said. "That's because of what I did in Chicago. That's funny because I was a kid who grew up in San Diego. I never played in any weather colder than 50 degrees in college. All of a sudden I get stuck in the coldest places I can be."

But being cold in Green Bay doesn't seem to bother Wagner, who calls the Packers the best organization he's played for. Wagner said his personal goals for this season are to improve both his consistency and net average.

"I'd like to definitely improve on my consistency so I get rid of the poor punts that kind of kill me," he said. "I just have to make sure that on every punt I'm not thinking of my past punts. I just have to make every punt my best punt."

Craig Hentrich, who was on the practice squad last season, was the only other punter on the roster when the Packers opened training camp. Hentrich could challenge to make the roster, but Wagner, like the Packers, is confident in his own ability.

"You're never going against the other guy in training camp," Wagner said. "You're going against your stats. That's what it comes down to, your stats in preseason games. If the other guy would happen to win the job, more power to him. But I'm not going to let that happen."

CHRIS JACKE

JOINS PACKERS' ELITE '500' CLUB

And now, after 75 seasons, there are five...

Don Hutson.....Paul Hornung.....Jim Taylor.....Chester Marcol.....and Chris Jacke.

Five players in the Green Bay Packers' three-quarter-century existence who have scored 500 points in a career—one of the most elite groups in the team's voluminous record book.

Jacke, an imperturbable Texan who now calls Green Bay home, became the fifth member of this highly exclusive fraternity in 1993 when he scored 128 points, third highest total in the National Football League last season, swelling his career collection to 514.

That production, based on 31 field goals in 37 attempts and 35 of a possible 35 conversions, also left him only 8 points shy of becoming the highest scoring pure kicker in Packer history as he entered the 1994 season. Immediately ahead: Chester Marcol (1972-80), possessor of that honor with 521 points.

Jacke, just the second Packer to scale the 500-point plateau in only five seasons, also figured to surpass third-ranking Jim Taylor (546) by mid-season.

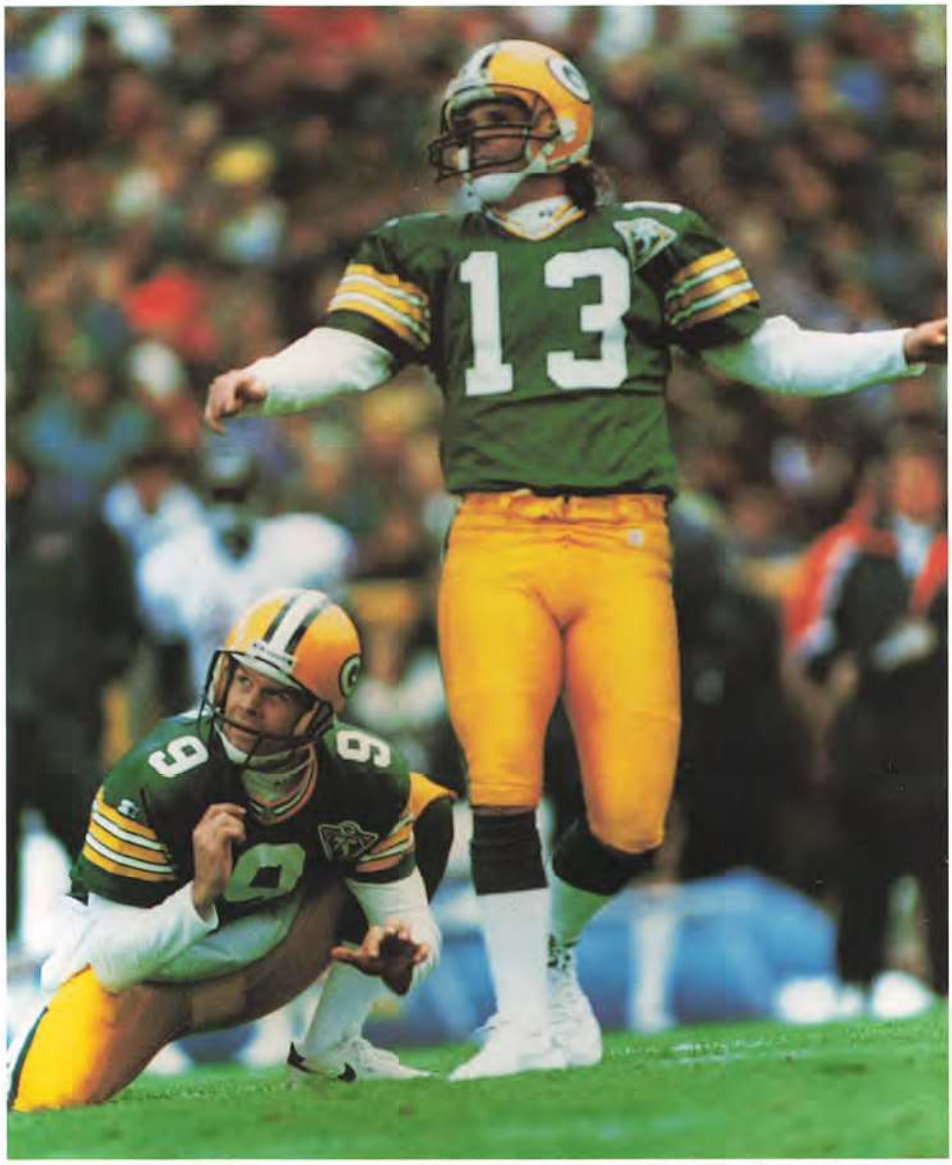
Hornung, who scored via rushing and receiving as well as by kicking, is the only other Packer to reach the 500-point level in five seasons. He had 501 after his first five campaigns.

Hutson, arguably the greatest offensive weapon in team annals, is the team's all-time leader with 823 points, followed by Hornung with 760. At his current pace, Jacke will need two, possibly three, more seasons to pass the pacesetting duo.

Joining the Packers' all-time scoring elite was not Jacke's only 1993 accomplishment. He set one record—for most field goals of 50 yards or more, season, 6, and extended three of his career standards—for most field goals of 50 yards or more, 12; most consecutive points after touchdown, 121 (a string he carries into the '94 season); and highest point after touchdown percentage, 99.40.

Jacke, who made all of his conversion attempts for the third consecutive year, now has converted on 166 of 167 PAT attempts over his five-year pro career.

Beginning the '94 season, he had not missed a conversion attempt since opening day of the 1990 season (September 9) against the Los Angeles Rams in Green Bay's Lambeau Field.



In addition to joining the Packer "500 Club" in 1993, the 28-year-old UTEP alumnus also ensconced himself among professional football's all-time elite in career field goal accuracy. He moved into fourth place with a 78.4 percentage, based on 116 completions in 148 attempts. The New York Jet's Nick Lowery began the current season as the lifetime leader with an 80.0 percentage (379 of 411), followed by Pete Stoyanovich of Miami with 79.6 (125 of 157) and the Giants' David Treadwell with a 78.5 ratio (124 of 158).

Chris Jacke, sighting in on a field goal launch in company with holder Bryan Wagner, already owns four Packer career records, including a career mark for most field goals of 50 yards or more (12).

HOLLAND, NOBLE

His position coach, Bob Valesente, described a retiring Johnny Holland as "a consummate professional."

And, over a seven-year Packer career, Number 50 was all of that.

But, more than anything, the soft-spoken Texan exemplified dignity and class. Ever modest in victory, he was invariably dignified in defeat. And, even if "excuses" were available to him, none were offered.

A role model for his peers, he was respected by his coaches and fellow players alike—for his leadership in the dressing room as well as his productivity on the field, where he led Green Bay's defense in tackles each of the past two seasons.

His injury-enforced retirement at the height of his career—he was coming off his best season ever in 1993—thus was both a substantial and unexpected blow to Head Coach Mike Holmgren and the Packers' defensive unit when Johnny reluctantly announced on May 20 that he would be playing no more.

Just how substantial is evidenced by his imposing career statistics. Overall, Holland posted more than 100 tackles per season over the last six years—the lone exception was his strike-shortened rookie season—amassing 777 stops, 492 of them unassisted. A second round draft choice out of Texas A & M in 1987, he also recorded 9 interceptions and was credited with 34 passes defensed, 13 fumble recoveries and 8 forced fumbles.

Holland, whose retirement was prompted by discovery of a second herniated disk in his neck (he had undergone surgery for the first such problem following the 1992 season), was philosophical about being forced to end his career prematurely.

"I feel pretty pleased with my career," he said, with a characteristically positive approach. "I accomplished a lot of things I wanted to do—not only on the field but off the field, working in the community with kids and bringing smiles to some faces.

"I can't complain. The positives definitely outweigh the negatives. I feel fortunate that my dreams of playing in the National Football League came true. I think the last two years probably were the best years of my career."

Holland, who had registered a career-high 145 tackles in 1993, pinpointed going to the playoffs as "the highlight of my career...And I think I'm departing on a positive note. Playing in the playoffs against the Cowboys in front of my family (at Texas Stadium) was the highlight.

"You always dream about playing in the Super Bowl. Unfortunately, I won't have the opportunity to do that. But I'll be a part of it if the Packers go to the Super Bowl this year, and I'm definitely rooting for them 150 per cent."

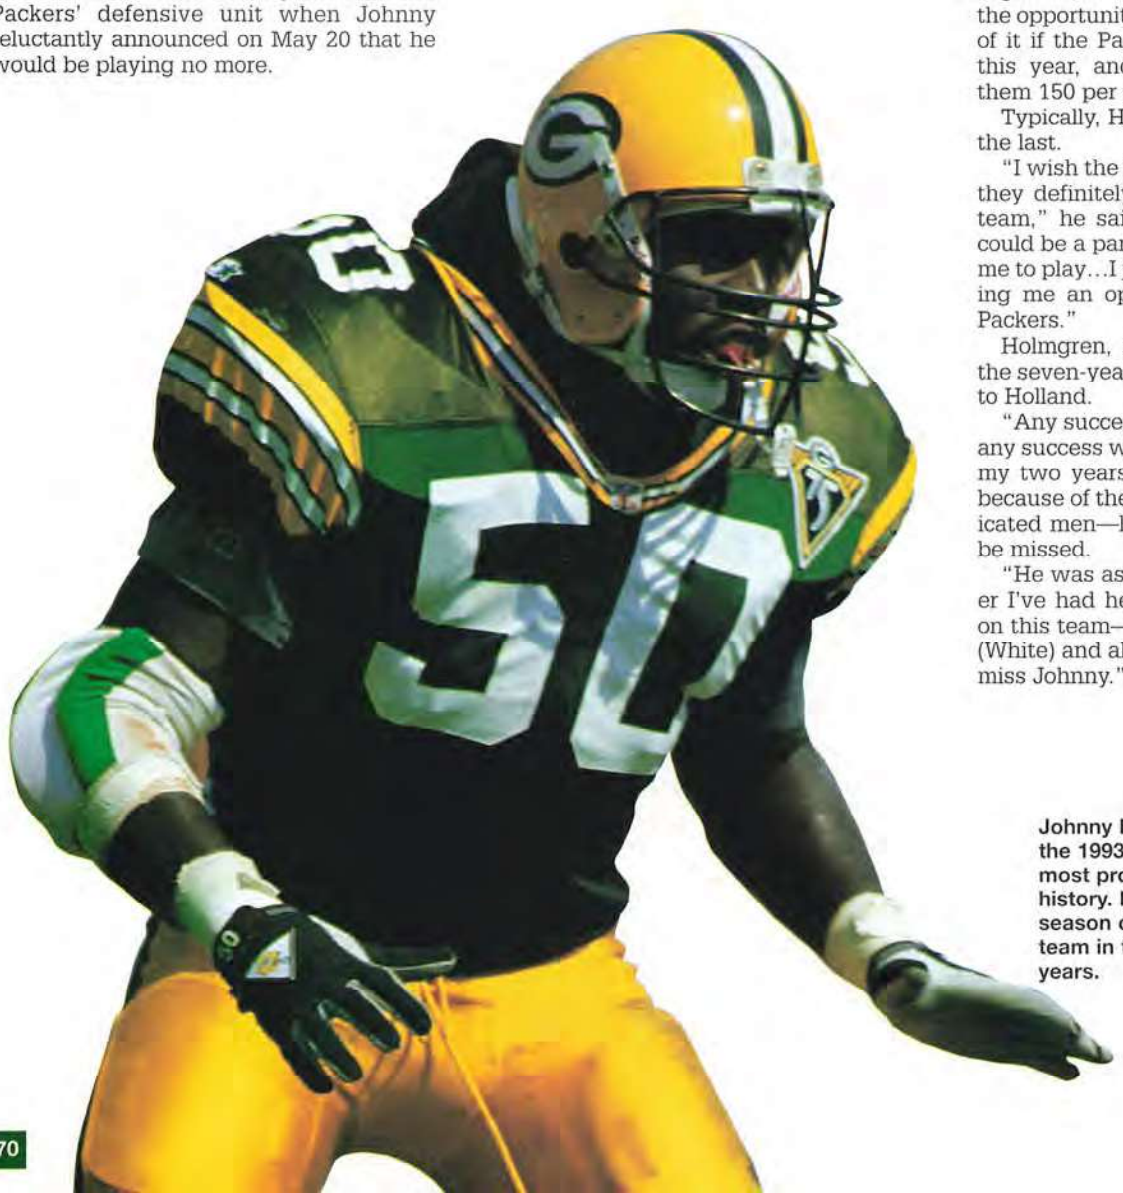
Typically, Holland was a team player to the last.

"I wish the best for the Packers and feel they definitely are going to have a good team," he said in bowing out. "I wish I could be a part of it but injury won't allow me to play...I just thank Green Bay for giving me an opportunity to play with the Packers."

Holmgren, commenting on the loss of the seven-year starter, paid sincere tribute to Holland.

"Any success I have had as a coach and any success we have had as a team during my two years here," he said, "has been because of the contributions of men—dedicated men—like Johnny Holland. He will be missed.

"He was as valuable to me as any player I've had here. There are great players on this team—Sterling Sharpe and Reggie (White) and all those guys...But, to me, I'll miss Johnny."



Johnny Holland, forced to retire following the 1993 season by injury, was one of the most productive performers in Packer history. He posted over 100 tackles per season over the last six years and led the team in tackles each of the last two years.

BOW OUT...WITH CLASS

The memory lingers on...Brian Noble, arms upraised in exultant triumph, emitting a lusty victory yell.

It became a familiar sight over the past nine seasons—a trademark of the swashbuckling Arizona State alumnus, an emotional, punishing inside linebacker with an infectious flair for the dramatic.

Regrettably, it will not be seen again.

Betrayed by a pair of surgical knees, he reluctantly called it a career last February upon advice from the Packers' medical staff and with the knowledge he would not again be able to play up to the high standards he had established upon joining the Green and Gold as a fifth round draft selection in 1985.

In essence, it was an era-ending retirement. Much like Ray Nitschke before him, the combative Californian had become a symbol of the all-out, blue collar, smashmouth approach to playing the game that long has been a Packer hallmark.

Typically, one of Noble's most vivid memories on his retirement day was of a thunderous hit he had laid upon the Chicago Bears' William "The Fridge" Perry.

Brian, who singlehandedly stuffed the 350-pound Perry for a one-yard loss near the Packers' goal line, recalled, "Everybody knew who was getting the ball and what was going to happen. It was just me and him. That was the last time the guy ever carried the ball."

"I never saw myself as a guy inside a dome with a towel hanging from my belt, wearing a bandanna."

A relentless competitor who invariably left everything he had on the field, Noble regularly had his most memorable performances against the arch-rival Bears, his statistical chart including 12 tackles in both 1990 meetings with the Midway Monsters and a career-high 16 stops in the Packers' first 1991 encounter with Chicago.

It was this kind of desire and dedication that prompted Packer General Manager Ron Wolf to describe Number 91 as "a consummate pro" upon his retirement.

"He was not a high draft pick out of Arizona State," Wolf noted, "but he developed into an outstanding inside backer for a number of years in a very, very tough division. He rates as one of the better run stoppers ever to play the game."

One of the most popular and productive performers in the Packers' 75-year history, Noble averaged more than 100 tackles per season, amassing over 800 stops during a 117-game career, 543 of them unassisted.

The personable Anaheim, CA., native, who had suffered career-ending knee injuries in a game against the Philadelphia Eagles in Green Bay's Lambeau Field last September 12, enjoyed perhaps his best overall season in 1989, supplementing a career-best 138 tackles with two of his three lifetime interceptions and two quarterback sacks, forcing one fumble, recovering one and being credited with 5 passes defensed.

Although Noble candidly admitted at the time he was drafted that the Packers would hardly have been his first choice of NFL affiliation, had he been given a choice, Brian had come to a diametrically different conclusion by the time he retired.

Frequently near tears on that historic day, he said he could not envision playing anywhere but in Green Bay.

"Yeah, I think I fit the Green Bay Packer image of mud, snow and ice or a perfectly clear fall day where you love to watch football," Noble summed up. "I never saw myself as a guy inside a dome with a towel hanging from my belt, wearing a bandanna."

An intense, emotional leader and performer, a vocal Brian Noble is caught in a typical pose, exhorting the crowd to turn up the volume.

PACKER 'HALL' ENSHRINES COFFMAN, ELLIS, DR. KELLY

by Lee Remmel

—Paul Coffman, who hails from the sweeping plains of Kansas, is a lifetime overachiever—an athlete who always exceeded expectations.

—Gerry Ellis, in contrast, was a versatile performer who quickly found himself cast off by his original team, the Los Angeles Rams, as an NFL rookie in 1980, then went on to a highly productive career with the Green Bay Packers, entrenching himself among the premier rushers, receivers and scorers in team annals.

—Dr. W. Webber Kelly, Jamaican-born and England-educated, found a permanent home in Green Bay—and his lifetime avocation as the Packers' first team physician, a one-time club president and a longtime member of the team's executive committee.

All three were formally enshrined in the Packer Hall of Fame the night of March 12, 1994 during the Hall's annual induction dinner, which drew a record gathering of nearly 1,000 loyalists to Green Bay's Regency Conference Center.

Coffman, who retired as the top receiving tight end in the Packers' 75-year history, was clearly moved by the honor conferred upon him. He said simply, "You work hard, you do your best, and then to be honored for that effort, it just feels good inside to know that people appreciate what you did and that you touched lives."

It was a poetic climax to a success story that reads a little like a fairy tale. A native of Chase, KS., (population 600), Coffman found his fellow townsmen were astounded when he announced—following graduation from high school—that he was planning to attend Kansas State University as a walk-on candidate for the football team.

Cautioning him against what they were privately convinced would be a major disappointment, they told the aspiring young tight end, 'They play big ball at Kansas State, Paul.'

But the determined Coffman was undaunted. He not only went to K-State and made the football team, he subsequently won a scholarship and earned second team All-Big Ten honors at tight end as a senior.

After his collegiate career came to an end, he insisted on a tryout with the Packers when Packer assistant coach John Meyer visited Kansas State in the spring of Paul's senior year to work out linebacker Gerry Spani. Accompanying Spani to the workout unannounced, Coffman informed Meyer he was going to try out for him. When the Packer aide good-naturedly consented to give him a "look" after he had finished his official business with Spani, Paul showed enough to warrant a training camp visit, then clawed his way onto the Green Bay roster as a rookie in 1978, largely because of his all-out hustle. But he played exclusively on special teams and caught no passes.

In his second season, however, he made a dramatic impact upon the Packers' offense, snaring 56 passes to lead the National Football Conference. He went on to catch 322 passes over an eight-year career and rank sixth on the team's all-time list—behind only James Lofton, Sterling Sharpe, Don Hutson, Boyd Dowler and Max McGee, elite company. In the process, he became a three-time Pro Bowl selection, in 1983, '84 and '85.

Ellis, like Coffman, described his induction as the event of a lifetime.

"To come in as a free agent as I did and end up in the position I am in right now, it's like a dream come true," he told his audience. "It's something that you really don't expect but, in the back of your mind, you wish one day would happen."

One of the great bargains in Packer history, Ellis joined the Green and Gold as a free agent during the second week of his rookie season and proceeded to make an immediate impact, emerging as the Packers' leading ground gainer in his very first game in a Green Bay uniform.

Today, following a seven-year career which ended in 1986, he is one of only three players in the team's entire existence—the others are Pro Football Hall of Famers Jim Taylor and Paul Hornung—to rank in the club's All-Time Top 20 in all three major offensive categories—rushing, receiving and scoring.

Ellis ranks a lofty fifth in rushing, all-time–behind only Taylor, John Brockington, Tony Canadeo and Clarke Hinkle–with 3,860 yards in 836 attempts. He also owns the best average per-carry, 4.6 yards, among those top five career rushers, a major distinction.

In addition, he stands ninth on the Packers' lifetime receiving list with 267 catches.

And, the possessor of a highly developed "nose" for the end zone, he is tied for 20th place on the club's career scoring list—with Carroll Dale and Elijah Pitts—at 210 points.

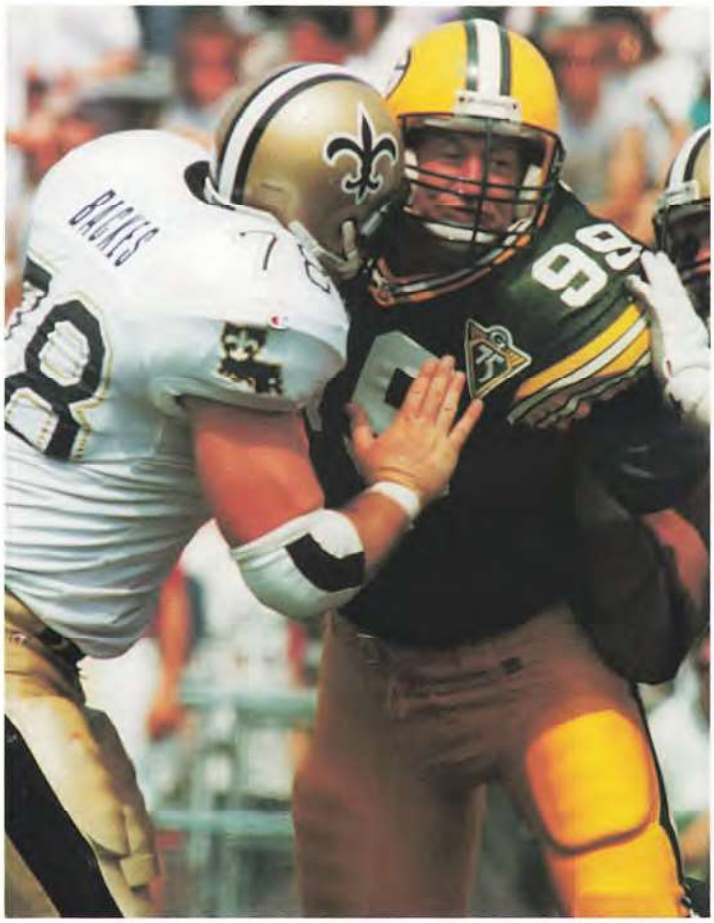
Dr. Kelly, honored posthumously (he died in 1951), became the fifth and final member of the famed "Hungry Five" to be enshrined in the Packer "Hall," joining A. B. Turnbull, Jerry Clifford, Lee Joannes and George Whitney Calhoun.

It was this visionary quintet which guided the Packers through a series of early financial crises to ultimate stability as substantial members of the National Football League.

Dr. Kelly, specifically, not only was the team's first physician—often providing his services to the players free of charge—but served in that capacity for 25 years, one of the longest associations in team history.

He also served one term as president of the then fledgling Green Bay Football Corporation—in 1929, and the Packers made his term a resounding success by winning their first NFL title that year. In addition, he was a longtime and important member of the corporation's executive committee, actively participating in the key decisions that preserved and maintained the Packers in the forefront of the NFL for more than a quarter century.

Dr. Kelly was represented by his daughter, Jacqueline, who called her late father's long-awaited induction "a wonderful honor."



Don Davey (99), harrying Saints' quarterback Wade Wilson, is expected to play a larger role in the Packer defense this season at a new position—right tackle. The former Wisconsin star played defensive end his past 3 seasons (1991-93).

Right cornerback Roland Mitchell, here honing in on the Bears' Neal Anderson, is the elder statesman of the Packers' youthful secondary at a mere 30.

Ed West, bulling his way for a first down against the Detroit Lions, has been one of the most productive free agents in Packer history. The 11-year pro enters the 1994 season as the 14th-ranked receiver in Packer history with 171 career catches—third among tight ends in team annals.

NFL CELEBRATES 75 YEARS

NFL 'CATCHES UP' WITH THE PACKERS, CELEBRATES 75TH SEASON

The National Football League is "catching up" with the Green Bay Packers this year.

Which is another way of saying the NFL this year is marking the 75th season of its existence—a milestone the Packers reached in 1993, a year earlier.

The Packers, founded as a town team in 1919 by the late E. L. "Curly" Lambeau, a home town football hero, already had a highly successful season of independent play behind them (10-1-0) when the NFL was organized—as the American Professional Football Association—at a 1920 meeting in a Hupmobile garage at Canton, OH.

Canton, of course, subsequently has become the home of the Pro Football Hall of Fame, in large part because it was the site of the league's genesis.

And the NFL, in the interim, has become the preeminent sports organization in the world—the standard by which all others are measured.

The Packers and the NFL have had a long and mutually rewarding relationship. The Packers, who had swept to a 19-2-1 record over their first two seasons of independence, did not join the infant AFPA until its second year of operation, 1921—the year before the league changed its name to the National Football league.

Officially, the Green Bay franchise was awarded to John E. Clair of the Acme Packing Company, then the "sponsor" of the fledgling football team because of having underwritten the cost of the club's jerseys.

It was the youthful Lambeau, however, who was to lead the Packers to national prominence—first as a player-coach who pioneered development of the forward pass in professional football as a tailback, later as an innovative field leader who escorted them to six NFL championships and more than 200 victories before leaving Green Bay in 1950 to become vice president and head coach of the then Chicago Cardinals.

A decade later, Vince Lombardi arrived upon the Green Bay scene—just months after the Packers had compiled the worst record in their history, 1-10-1, under former Chicago Bear Ray "Scooter" McLean — and proceeded to generate a a new era of artistic prosperity for the Packers, leading them to five NFL titles and back-to-back victories in the first two Super Bowls.

As the NFL observes its diamond anniversary, the Packers thus can look back with pardonable pride upon their contributions. Although they have not won a league title since 1967, they own more championships (11) than any other team in NFL history—their immemorial rivals, the Chicago Bears, are next up with 9—and can boast of 18 former players and coaches enshrined in the Pro Football Hall of Fame—a total surpassed only by the Bears.

The league also, of course, has good reason to celebrate. An organization of myriad fly-by-night teams in the '20s—the Muncie Flyers, the Tonawanda Kardex and the Evansville Crimson Giants, among others—it now has teams from coast to coast, with preseason games and burgeoning fan support around the globe, not to mention domed stadiums, artificial turf, giant video replay screens—and players making 10 times as much money as the President of the United States and franchises selling for the price of small Caribbean islands.

The season-long, 75-year festivities include the selection of the All-Time NFL Team, 48 players guaranteed to generate both awe and controversy; replication of authentic vintage uniforms, which will be worn by each team at least one game during the '94 season; and a series of books to mark the occasion.

Happy Anniversary, National Football League.

THE WAY IT WAS: The photo above, taken during Packer game at Bellevue Park in the early 1920's, graphically illustrates how it was when the Green Bay Packers and the National Football League were in their infancy.

TIME FOR A CHANGE?

Over the past four seasons, the Chicago Bears, Detroit Lions and Minnesota Vikings have won the National Football Conference's Central Division championship—with the Packers and Tampa Bay Buccaneers looking on—the Bears having triumphed in 1990, the Vikings in 1992 and the Lions having duplicated their 1991 title in 1993.

The latter achievement, the Packers ruefully recall, came at their reluctant expense on the final day of the '93 regular season, a game in which Detroit prevailed at the Pontiac, MI, Silverdome.

Just one week later, the Packers avenged that indignity with a last-minute, come-from-behind 28-24 victory in a wild card playoff contest staged on the same Silverdome turf.

Based on that success—Green Bay's first playoff victory since 1982—and the alleged law of averages—the Packers would like to think that the time for a changing of the guard in the division penthouse (and the wherewithal to bring it about) is at hand.

The return of a maturing Brett Favre, a two-time Pro Bowler, at quarterback, the presence of record-breaking receiver Sterling Sharpe, the only player in NFL history to catch 100 passes in two seasons, and the return of a defense which ranked a lofty second in the league overall last season, present three strong arguments for optimism.

Augment these assets with the addition through free agency of Reggie Cobb, a proven 1,000-yard rusher, and defensive end Sean Jones, one of the top 10 career sack artists in league annals, plus that of the nation's leading collegiate rusher in 1993, LeShon Johnson, via the draft, and there is legitimate cause to believe the '94 Packers can prevail in the NFC Central—for the first time since 1972.

Admittedly, there are formidable obstacles in their path, notably a Viking team bolstered by the acquisition of Pro Bowl quarterback Warren Moon and the return of their premier running back, Terry Allen, who sat out the '93 season following knee surgery; a Detroit entry fortified by the signing of free agent quarterback Scott Mitchell; and a neighboring Chicago Bear club enhanced by the addition of former Lions quarterback Erik Kramer and two quality running backs, ex-Giant Lewis Tillman and former Steeler Merrill Hoge.

But, as Head Coach Mike Holmgren has preached since arriving upon the Green Bay scene in 1993, "You have to believe good things are going to happen (before they can occur) ...and that's a mindset."

ALL-TIME WINNER SHULA CUTS A BIG FIGURE ON PACKER SCHEDULE

Don Shula, now the winningest coach in pro football, has been perfect against the Packers.

The already legendary Don Shula, an adversary the Packers have found highly anti-social over the past quarter-century, cuts a prominent figure on the Green and Gold's 1994 schedule.

The Packers encounter the winningest coach in professional football history—Shula moved past longtime leader George Halas in 1993—not once but twice during the course of their '94 exertions.

Milwaukee County Stadium, by sheerest coincidence, serves as a backdrop for both meetings with Shula's Miami Dolphins, perennial contenders for the American Football Conference's Eastern Division championship.

The 45th Midwest Shrine Game, a contest which has raised well over $2 million for charity since its inception in 1950, provides the vehicle for the first of these assignments, which will find the Packers entertaining the Dolphins Saturday evening, August 13, in their second preseason venture.

Less than a month later, Sunday afternoon, September 11, the Packers will see the square-jawed Shula again prowling County Stadium's east sideline, demanding yet another win from his "Fish" in a regular season confrontation.

On the latter occasion, the Packers will be in search of their first victory over the Dolphins' enduring field leader, who owns a perfect record against Green Bay over his 24-year tenure as Miami's head coach. Shula, who begins the '94 season with 327 regular season and playoff victories to his credit, holds a 7-0 mark against the Packers as the Dolphins' major-domo.

A week prior to that meeting with Miami, the Packers will find themselves facing a critical opening day test—against recent nemesis Minnesota in their regular season inaugural at Green Bay's Lambeau Field Sunday afternoon, September 4, a day on which they will be seeking their first victory over the Vikings since 1991.

Once Minnesota and Miami are out of the way, they gird for an invasion of Philadelphia Sunday, September 18, when ex-Eagle Reggie White returns to the "Vet" for the first time as a Packer.

Then it's back to the familiar NFC Central to host the Tampa Bay Buccaneers Sunday, September 25, in the annual "Homecoming" game, one which will be doubly meaningful for the old grads this year because the Packers will be wearing their "throwback" uniforms in marking the National Football League's 75th anniversary. The Green and Gold will be sporting silks dating from the late '30s, when their principal colors were navy blue and gold.

A visit to New England—their first regular season showing at Foxboro, MA, Stadium since 1985—on Sunday, October 2, and a Lambeau Field date against the Los Angeles Rams Sunday, October 9, are next on the agenda, preceding the Packers' lone open date, scheduled Sunday, October 16.

The latter will be followed by a pair of challenging prime time appearances—a national cable (TNT) matchup with the Vikings at the Minneapolis Metrodome Thursday night, October 20, and an ABC "Monday Night Football" showdown against the Bears at Chicago's Soldier Field Halloween night (October 31).

Just six days later, the Packers draw a third consecutive NFC Central assignment against the Detroit Lions at Milwaukee County Stadium Sunday afternoon, November 6, before returning to Green Bay to host the New York Jets Sunday afternoon, November 13.

Then, moving from the proverbial frying pan into the fire, the Packers face last January's Super Bowl principals, the Buffalo Bills and repeating champion Dallas Cowboys, within a five-day span. They invade Buffalo Sunday, November 20, then travel to Texas Stadium Thursday, November 24, to duel the Cowboys in a Thanksgiving Day contest, just 97 hours later.

Following a 10-day, post-holiday respite, the Packers launch the final quarter of their '94 schedule, taking on the Detroit Lions in the Pontiac, MI, Silverdome Sunday, December 4, and entertaining the Bears in a Lambeau Field rematch Sunday, December 11.

They then close out their home agenda against the Atlanta Falcons in County Stadium Sunday, December 18, before wrapping up the regular season, just six days later—on Saturday, December 24—a matchup which will mark only the second time in team history they have played a regular season game on Christmas Eve day.
